"There is tremendous emphasis today placed on education and a tremendous amount of desire for something to be made of this interest," Carlin said.

Education in the future will have to stress the necessity to retrain and adapt, he said.

"We have to look at the kids going into kindergarten today and project ahead to the time when they will be coming to Kansas State University, and what a different time it's going to be," Carlin said. "What we have taken for granted in the past just won't work. We are approaching the time when having degrees won't matter, but it will be the actual quality of the product.

"The whole system has got to adjust," he said. "We've got to teach our young people to learn, to comprehend and to communicate. When they leave school they will have only a small part of the total knowledge they will gain in their life time."

Carlin said the people of Kansas support higher education, but are concerned about the quality of today's education.

"The key element in getting additional dollars to put into education is the efficiency factor and the quality factor," Carlin said. "I am convinced the people of Kansas see education as a high priority and would be very willing to support additional spending in education. I also believe they have to be convinced that their money will be used in a very wise and effective way. We have to prove to the people of Kansas that we're not talking about just pouring more money into the same system with no change."

Carlin said now is the best time for such a change to occur.

"There has never been an explosion of media attention like there has been this last year," the governor said. "Now is our time. Something has got to change and the emphasis will be on quality."

"I am very supportive of the regents and the program review policy," Carlin said. "Change, I understand, is painful, but it has to come."

John Montgomery, regents chairman, who also spoke at the seminar, agreed with Carlin's emphasis on quality.

In its October meeting, the regents began their first summary of a five-year review program in which all programs offered by regents schools will be reviewed. Montgomery said this was an attempt to improve the quality of education and to save money.

"We will have less of the wide range of programs offered by most states, but what we have will be exemplary," he said. "Institutions will have to look carefully at undergraduate programs and be sure the highest emphasis is on quality."

Cutting programs would save money not by reducing the amount of money the state would spend, he said, but by reducing the number of programs universities would have to spend money on.

Montgomery said he also would like to see more participation by instructors in the program reviews.

"I would like to see a greater participation next year by the faculty than I perceive happened the first time," he said. "They could extend the information past the forms given to give the board a fuller understanding of the program."

Carlin said that in order to achieve the goals of better quality in education, the public will have to be brought to understand the benefits of such a system.

"I know there is no way to do all that has to be done in terms of higher education in one year, let alone three," Carlin said, "but I hope 1984 will be the year we take the first steps. I am committed to making as much of the transition as possible in the three years I have to contribute."

Home heating costs soar despite attempts to save

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The price Americans pay to heat their homes continues to soar despite conservation efforts by both rich and poor households, according to a home energy use study released Tuesday by the government.

The annual survey by the Energy Information Administration said energy consumption remained stable from 1980 through 1981, but the cost of that energy rose 14 percent over the year.

The stable consumption level broke a three-year trend of falling consumption. Over the four years the survey has been conducted, however, total energy consumption has dropped 10 percent, despite an increase of 8 percent in the number of households.

But during the same period, expenditures increased 53 percent, exceeding the 30 percent rate of inflation during the same period.

J. Erich Evered, head of the statistical agency, said the rising costs were due to fuel prices. He cited a 124 percent increase in the cost of fuel oil in the Northeast during the period, which ran from April 1981 through March 1982.

The study of the 1982-83 winter is now under way. Evered predicted that it would show a similar overall price rise because of increases last year in the cost of natural gas.

The rising prices continue to prompt households to conserve, Evered said, often by dialing down their thermostats.

Evered said the most surprising result of the survey was that rich and poor households tended to spend the same amount for home heating, indicating that affluent homeowners do not waste energy simply because they can afford it.

Progress

This is a grouchy column today — one written by what certain people keep telling me is an old man now, although how I can be thought of as old is beyond my powers of comprehension and acceptance.

Anyhow, if you don't want to bother with one more complaint about how "things aren't what they used to be," turn to some other part of this newspaper. I'm certain you'll be able to find complaints about other, more frightening, matters there.

Remember when you could buy a lollipop for a penny? Or a stick of gum of any flavor? Sometimes the hard candy didn't even cost a penny apiece. Why, I can remember when I was in the fifth grade in 1932, the drugstore at the corner of what was virtually the only intersection in Thomas, Okla., sold big, fat, round jaw-breakers at a cost of six for a penny. Two cents would buy a whole day's supply.

There weren't very many places of interest in Thomas besides that drugstore. Naturally, it was called the Thomas Drug Store. Next door was a movie theater which seated about 100 people. Across the street was a four-bed hospital. On the opposite corner was a single-story one-room bank. Intersections of any kind were a rarity in that town.

But it isn't the disappearance of small towns or cheapness contrasted against expense I'm complaining about today.

All my life I've been very fond of butterscotch balls. It so happens that the candy counter at the Information Desk in the Student Union here sells butterscotch balls. They cost 40 cents for one-quarter of a pound.

One day I bought 40 cents worth, later counting the balls in that amount. There were 20 balls.

The next time I bought butterscotch I asked for 20 cents worth. I was given 10 balls. Well, I thought, that works out to one ball for two cents.

A week or so ago, all I had in my pocket was a dime and a $5 bill in my wallet.

I walked up to the candy counter and said, "Please give me 10 cents worth of butterscotch balls."

The person behind the candy counter fixed a glassy stare on me. I got the impression she was trying to act superior, wanting to convince me she was the authority figure in this transaction. "Can't sell you only 10 cents worth," she said. "Has to be at least 20 cents."

I pondered this for several seconds. "Well, then," I finally said, "how about selling me five balls?"

"Can't sell you that few. Has to be at least 10 balls."

"All I have is a dime."

"Too bad," she said, turning away.

"Listen," I called after her, "I happen to have a $5 bill in my wallet."

She turned back. "That'll be all right," she said.

"You mean you'd sooner give me $4.80 in change than drop a dime in your cash register?"

"That's right," she replied. "Cash register won't take a dime." She seemed to be almost getting angry.

At this point, the manager of the Information Desk came up to the counter from the back room where she had been standing. Now, I've known this woman for some time. We've visited with each other on several occasions when I've come to this counter to buy a pack of cigarettes or something like that.

"Let me explain the situation," she said to me. "The cash register has been computerized so that it can't record a purchase of less than 20 cents."

"You mean that one human being can't give a dime anymore to another human being to drop in that cash register?"

"It won't register just one dime. Has to be at least two dimes. It's the only way we can keep accurate records." She smiled. "I hope you understand."

"Oh, I understand," I said. "It's what is called progress these days."

"I guess that's right," she said. "Well, give me 20 cents worth. You'll just have to change this $5 bill for me."

And that's what my complaint is about today. Understand, I'm not criticizing the Union — or any other similar organization — for having computerized its activities in search of greater efficiency. But I question the advisability of becoming so depersonalized in searching for efficiency that human exchange can no longer occur.

As far as I'm personally concerned, I'll get over the trauma of having my dime refused. I'm grown up now. Also, I've grown quite used to not having any attention paid to my two cents worth on most matters.

On the other hand, I feel sadness at the thought of some 6-year-old, clutching a dime, standing in front of a candy counter looking at the bright colors of various hard candies, counting on fingers up to five pieces, only to have at the final moment of delicious decision and expectant request the dime refused!

As I implied at the beginning of this column, things aren't what they used to be.

Is it progress when we get to the point that one butterscotch ball can no longer be bought for two pennies? If that is really believed to be progress, then it seems to me there's something wrong with our thinking.

The apartment price crunch

WASHINGTON — Housing gurus, whose principal fetish is the rise and fall of the prime rate, have recently added the unglamorous rental housing market to their worry sheet. Many predict that American renters will soon be forced to pay crippling portions of their incomes for shelter.

The experts' bold oracle, of course, is hardly news to some urbanites, particularly those who reside in the trendier sections of America's largest cities. Rents of $500 a month — for what is often a seedy single bedroom with a minimum of living space — are already standard in Chicago's Near North Side, Washington's DuPont Circle and just about every part of Manhattan. Against all better judgment, many renters in those areas already allocate far more than the conventional 25 percent of monthly income for rent.

Yet the crunch that is somewhat endemic to chic neighborhoods will soon be felt elsewhere, according to the experts. Chief among the many reasons are home-purchase prices, which have been pushed up in recent years by interest rates. Average home prices far exceed the average head of household's ability to pay. As a result, after a 40-year drift toward homeownership, the share of household heads who rent is increasing steadily.

Meanwhile, during the last 10 years, the supply of rental housing hasn't increased as quickly as that of owner-occupied shelter. Transient tenants and rent control laws, developers insist, have made rental unit construction a risky business. Moreover, according to the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, the largest share of rental units — about a third — was built before World War II and doesn't receive adequate maintenance.

The resulting picture is clear: An unprecedented number of renters is converging on an under-supply of deteriorating rental stock. One can almost hear the crunch.

Variety in the rental housing market makes it difficult to predict how far or how fast rents will jump. But one indication comes from the Brookings Institution's Anthony Downs, who recently published a thorough study, "Rental Housing in the 1980s."

Downs notes that in January 1981 rents began to lead consumer prices for the first time since 1960, and, as of August 1983, were outpacing the CPI by a ratio of more than two-to-one. Downs told our reporter, Michael Duffy, that high interest rates will continue to force landlords to rely on higher rents to recoup income.

What the gurus are wondering now is whether Congress, which for years has worked to make homeownership attractive, can do anything to ease the rental crunch. In fact, two lawmakers have come up with an idea so well-conceived that, as one University of California urban planning expert said, "...it represents one of the rare cases where a change in the law will allow everyone to benefit."

Sponsored by Reps. Fortney Stark (D-Calif.) and Bill Archer (R-Texas), the Condominium Cost Reduction Act would change complex tax law provisions to provide landlords with an alternative to traditional condo conversion. Current law only encourages landlords to sell outright to middlemen, or "condo converters," who, in turn, jack up the price of renovated units to cover finance costs. Landlords cannot sell individual units profitably; tenants often have no choice between buying their apartment at ludicrous prices or being displaced.

Under Starker-Archer, landlords themselves would be able to convert their buildings, unit by unit, and receive a fair return. In time:

— Because conversions today inflate the price of condominiums by upwards of 25 percent, less costly landlord conversions would immediately ease homeownership for those at the top of the rental market.

— Because the bill would allow landlords to convert units one at a time, it would discourage displacement of those renters, particularly low-income and the elderly, who can't afford to buy.

— Because tenants would have the chance to own their one-bedroom, they would be encouraged to put down roots and take better care of their apartments.

No less beneficial are the bill's macro-economic effects. New tax advantages would encourage the construction of rental housing, helping to ease the short supply. Longer tenure by tenants also would build stronger neighborhoods and increase local tax bases.

Not surprisingly, this minor correction in tax law faces no opposition in the House or the Senate, where an identical bill was introduced Nov. 3. Both the National Association of Home Builders and the National Apartment Association back the bill; best of all, it would cost the Treasury practically nothing, according to a House subcommittee.

While neither Stark nor Archer guarantees their measure will solve the rental crisis, they've laid a solid foundation for additional measures in the future.

America's role as protector

Editor,

In response to the Nov. 18 article, "Minister Urges 'Day After' Precautions," and the Sunday night airing of "The Day After," I would like to pose some considerations.

People on both sides of the nuclear arms issue will agree that nuclear war presents a grave and frightening threat. But disarmament is certainly not the way to avoid nuclear war. On the contrary, if the United States lets down its defenses, it opens itself to a Soviet attack.

Throughout history, the Soviets have sought to conquer their weaker adversaries. Consider the fact that Poland, Hungary, Afghanistan and Czechoslovakia have suffered from Soviet aggression, but the NATO countries have not fallen prey. Russia has declared that the United States is its enemy, and the Soviets are simply waiting for a chance to show their might. As long as America stands firm, its chances of nuclear war diminish.

In your article, the question is asked "Which is more dangerous to God's creation, nuclear weapons or communism?" Nuclear weapons will not be used unless we give Russia such an advantage. And how long would Christianity survive in a communist America?

Before the cries for disarmament burst forth, one must evaluate our priorities toward maintaining democratic ideals and remaining the powerful protector of the free world.

Real campus problem is ignorance

Editor,

As president of the group that sponsored the Nov. 16 rally against U.S. intervention in Central America, I would like to make a comment concerning apathy. The editorial column "The right to protest" denies that apathy has settled upon our campus, citing, for example, that if the greek system were abolished, there would indeed be protest; CISCA's own protest further belies the accusation of apathy.

Yet, to clarify that K-State does not actually suffer "apathy" is not to nullify the disturbing obstacle which we all face. To redefine this problem-which-is-not-apathy, what plagues this campus is a combination of:

- 1) Ignorance and contentment with ignorance;
- 2) A lack of humanity;
- 3) Inarticulacy.

The first part of the problem, which some would see as a synonym of apathy, was demonstrated after the rally when a young man attempted to argue for the justice of the landholding system of El Salvador without being familiar with either the system or its history. Such presumption is not uncommon.

The inhumanity is shown by the usual reaction to the suffering of Central Americans: if the people are poor, starving and victimized by death squads, it is somehow their own fault. Pictures of the mutilated, headless bodies of children merely document justified attempts to maintain order against the communists and guerillas. Compassion seems scarce here.

The third point was indicated by, among other things, the apple and the remark "Kill a Commie for Mommie" thrown from the crowd at the rally. Apparently these missiles were signals of disagreement with our message, but they were essentially meaningless. Very little coherent argument has been directed against us.

It may well be that apathy is not our enemy. Ironically, unfortunately, I suspect that apathy would be preferable to the enemies which I perceive and have outlined here.

Senate to vote on three finance bills

By The Collegian Staff

A trio of spending and funding bills which would have various effects on Student Governing Association policy if enacted are up for voting at Thursday's Student Senate meeting.

The new regulations would not allow any SGA allocated money to be spent on "parties, social functions or banquets, including decorations and/or table arrangements," "the purchase and/or the personalizing of gifts, plaques, awards or flowers" and "clothing — with exceptions being approved by Finance Committee and Student Senate."

Revisions to the Council Funding Policy would have all councils under the policy and not just college councils. This would include the Fine Arts Council, Sports Club Council and International Coordinating Council.

The last bill of the trio is the 1984-85 Spending Policy for Councils.

As explained at senate's Nov. 17 meeting, the new regulations are set guidelines for senate to now follow.

Another bill up for a vote would establish a Nichols Hall Art Committee to collect information and bids for art to be placed in the lobby of Nichols Hall.

A resolution sponsoring receptions for senate candidates which would be held in various locations across campus also will receive a vote. The receptions are to help increase student involvement with student government.

In senate's open session, Lynn Hickey, K-State women's basketball head coach, will speak about her team and the upcoming season.

Expert says schools need unity, not fault-finding

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas needs unity and not a divisive debate over who is at fault if there are problems in the state's public education system, Dr. Harold Blackburn said Tuesday.

"If there is one thing that Kansas' legislators, its people and its board of education members do not need, it is to engage in a debate over who's fault it is," Blackburn told the closing business session of the annual convention of the Kansas Association of School Boards.

"Do not let it break up your unity. We're all in this together," he added. Blackburn, who on Dec. 18 becomes commissioner of education for Kansas, succeeding Dr. Merle Bolton who is retiring, delivered his first major speech since being selected as the new commissioner by the state Board of Education on Nov. 8.

He used the occasion to encourage members of local boards of education in the state to actively involve themselves in the current public discussion over what is wrong with American education and to help make the decisions to correct what problems exist.

"We have good schools here in Kansas, and we simply have to make them better," he said.

"I'm optimistic about the educational reforms they're talking about nationwide, but I'm also concerned about some things."

"We need constructive concern at the right time, and I think that is now, and at the right place, and I think that is here at your convention. 'You're young in spirit and that's what Kansas needs to address its educational problems. These studies simply demand that we study the facts, listen to each other and that we get a little worried until we solve them.'"

Blackburn, 55, who has been assistant state education commissioner the past 16 months and before that was a federal education official for 15 years, alluded to the National Commission on Excellence in Education's report, "A Nation at Risk," and subsequent reports which have stressed a need to improve the U.S. educational system.

The debate over those reports, he said, now is entering a period of criticism, with groups pointing their fingers at other groups in assessing blame for what is perceived to be a decline in the quality of education in this country.

"I am concerned that we retain our unity as we go about this task of educational reform," said Blackburn. "We need board members in educational reform who will help make the decisions and then stand by the administrators and teachers when the changes are carried out."

Saying he was optimistic the impending changes in requiring better teacher education, higher standards for teachers, higher graduation requirements and placing more emphasis on basic subjects will be positive in Kansas, Blackburn stressed the role of local board members in bringing about those changes.

"I am interested that you speak your piece about teacher preparation," he said. "We've got to insure that the teachers who enter your buildings are adequately prepared, and by and large they are..."

"I'm optimistic about educational reform in Kansas...because of your willingness to be involved. You simply have to be involved."

Panel to define media's role in war

WASHINGTON — The chief of a commission appointed by Army Gen. John Vessey, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, will seek the opinions of editorial and publishers' associations on news coverage of future military operations like the U.S. invasion of Grenada, a Defense Department spokesman said Tuesday.

Spokesman Michael Burch said the panel's chairman, retired Army Maj. Gen. Winant Sidle, also will seek advice from organizations in the news business in the form of answers to questions Sidle plans to submit to them.

The objective, Burch said, is "how the media can be accommodated in future military operations."

Vessey appointed the commission after news organizations protested the exclusion of reporters and other news personnel seeking to accompany U.S. troops landing on Grenada Oct. 25. Reporters were not allowed on the island until the third day of the operation.

America's richest prefers music

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — Gordon P. Getty, considered by many to be the richest man in America, only wanted to talk about music in a visit to Yale University.

"Nothing about Getty Oil, please," he said at a talk Monday with about 30 students.

Getty, the 49-year-old son of the late billionaire J. Paul Getty, was at the university to hear the East Coast premiere of his composition "The White Election" at a Yale residential college.

Recently dubbed the wealthiest man in America by Forbes magazine, Getty said he got his start in music at the age of 4 or 5 while taking piano lessons. "just like any other school kid." He did some composing as a young man, but then he got into the family business. Now he's a member of the board of directors.

He got back to composing after reading a volume of Emily Dickinson's poetry in Paris and finding verses that he thought would make a fine libretto for a song cycle. "The White Election" was completed in 1980 and has been performed occasionally on the West Coast. Its East Coast premiere was scheduled for Tuesday night.

Getty says he regards himself as a composer with no more than "minimum talent."

"I don't know the necessary ingredients for being a composer," he said. "And I don't know if I have them."

Betty Ford finds her own calling

RANCHO MIRAGE, Calif. — Former first lady Betty Ford says that after a lifetime of politics with her husband, she has found a calling that is her own.

More and more, Mrs. Ford, 65, finds herself lecturing on alcohol and drug addiction to patients at the Betty Ford Center of the Eisenhower Medical Center, near the house where she lives with former President Ford in the Palm Springs area.

Mrs. Ford, who told the public about her alcohol dependency in 1978 and entered Long Beach Naval Hospital, says alcoholism is a disease that can strike anyone.

Last week, drunken driving charges against her son, Jack Ford, were dropped when he pleaded guilty to reckless driving. Ford, 31, was fined $250, but still faces possible loss of his driver's license for refusing to submit to a breath test when stopped on a highway in Cardiff, Calif.

Mrs. Ford said in an interview published Tuesday, that she had succumbed to pressure "of always having to be 'on' when you feel very 'un-on' or very down inside."

City ponders change in malt beverage policy

By LUCINDA ELLISON
Manhattan Editor

City commissioners reviewed provisions for change in the ordinance restricting the issuance of a cereal malt beverage license Tuesday afternoon during a work session.

Currently, the ordinance bans issuance of cereal malt beverage licenses to businesses within 200 feet of a city or parochial school. The review was prompted by the controversy surrounding licensing of Charlie's Neighborhood Bar in the First Center, Claflin Road and Denison Avenue.

Although no decisions were made, the commission agreed that the issuance of a license to Charlie's Neighborhood Bar should not be denied.

"No one is saying we're going to deny the license. If the rules have been met, we have no choice," Mayor Wanda Fateley said.

The issuance of the license and changes in the ordinance are scheduled for discussion during the Dec. 20 City Commission meeting.

Construction of the bar raised some community disapproval because of its location within 200 feet of the Institute of Religion. The institute is owned and operated by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. The school does not hold classes on a regular schedule, but representatives had asked city officials to consider it as a parochial school in the issue.

Although the commission made no binding action, provisions for changing the ordinance for future cases was discussed.

Two items for possible change in the ordinance were presented by city staff at the work session. The words city or parochial schools, which were included in the current ordinance, would be changed to public or private. The means of measuring the 200-foot boundary was also presented for clarification.

Discussion of the means of measuring the 200-foot boundary was delayed for the next commission meeting.

Mayor Wanda Fateley suggested the need to define public and private schools for the incident currently under discussion and also for future cases, such as any which may arise if Aggieville expands and becomes closer to Manhattan Christian College.

Some questions were raised as to whether the Commission should also include the definition of a church in the ordinance. Concerns from representatives of both the Institute of Religion and MCC were aired during discussion of the ordinance at the Nov. 16 City Commission meeting.

"I think we should allow for permanent religious institutions to have the exception apply to them," Commissioner Suzanne Lindamood said.

The original intent of the ordinance was to protect children under 18 years old, Commissioner

Rick Mann said.

"My intent was to expand what the ordinance was applying to," Fateley said. "And it's not with the intent to protect 18 year-olds."

"I'm just convinced that the majority of the community would like to see this protection (200-foot barrier) given to the Manhattan Christian College and the Institute of Religion," she added. "I have the feeling that, for most religions, there is a little bit of disapproval associated with drinking."

Oral Roberts University head coach, Dick Acres, protests an official's call as his 6-foot-11 son, Mark Acres, fouls out late in the game. K-State took advantage of the Titan center's absence by driving the lanes en route to its first victory.

K-State uses scoring balance in victory

By KEVIN DALE
Staff Writer

The K-State men's basketball team combined excellent shooting and a stingy defense to overcome a sloppy first half and snap a four-game losing streak at Ahearn Field House by defeating Oral Roberts University 82-74.

The Wildcats finished with a 57 percent shooting from the field and an uncharacteristic 79 percent from the free-throw line in their rally against the taller Titans.

The game began in much the same way as the 'Cats' two previous losses. A nervous K-State team came out and Oral Roberts took advantage of Wildcat turnovers to gain the early advantage.

Sophomore forward Ben Mitchell kept the 'Cats within striking distance in the early going with tenacious inside play, but the Titans still controlled the boards with 6-foot-11 center Mark Acres.

Acres gave Oral Roberts second shots with his offensive rebounding and allowed K-State mostly one-shot chances at the basket as the 'Cats were unable to muscle the 220-pound junior out of the lane. Oral Roberts built a sizable lead before transfers Eric Watson and Tom Alfaro started to provide the Wildcats with an offensive explosion.

Sophomore guard Jim Roder's 12-foot jumper with 27 seconds left in the half brought the 'Cats to within two, 39-37, but Acres then gave ORU a four-point intermission edge when he swished an eight-foot baseline jumper to put the Titans up, 41-37.

During halftime, Jack Hartman, Wildcat head coach, adjusted the defense's plan to keep the Titans off the boards.

The strategy worked at the start of the second half as the Wildcats sagged their defense into the lane to get better rebounding position. Mitchell and junior Eddie Elder began to keep Acres away from the basket while the Wildcat offense moved into high gear.

K-State took the lead 57-56 at the 12:08 mark when Roder stole the ball at midcourt and dropped in a layup.

The celebration did not last long, however, as ORU came back to score. The Titans had a three-point lead when Roder caught fire.

The 6-foot-3 guard then scored six unanswered points to give the Wildcats a lead they never relinquished.

With the defense collapsed in the lane, Oral Roberts was forced to go over the backs of K-State's inside men to rebound and the fouls began piling up.

With 8:13 to go, Acres got his fifth foul. With him gone, the middle opened up and Roder and Watson began to penetrate the Titan defense.

Down by four with time running out, the Titans were forced to foul to get the ball back. The Wildcats were up to the challenge as they connected on a perfect 10-for-10 showing from the charity stripe in the final minutes.

Elder, who finished with a team-high 10 caroms, controlled the boards, and Watson and Alfaro kept up the scoring, and with 18 seconds left, the Wildcats had built their lead to 10. Dwight Givens' 16-foot jumper with two seconds left to cut the lead to eight but it was too little too late and the 'Cats held on to win.

"I thought that was a very good basketball game," Hartman said. "Certainly, Oral Roberts has our respect. They have an excellent team. That makes me prouder of our team. I was impressed with the way we stayed in the ballgame and fought back. We got ahead of them and held it."

The Wildcats' balance was the difference as each player took control at different times during the game.

"There were times when each of the starters seemed to project themselves into the game," Hartman said. It's nothing we plan, it's just the way it worked out. We want everybody to make a contribution. You never want to have to depend on two or three scorers."

Roder, who paced the Wildcats with 20 points, including 14 in the second half, said he likes the chemistry of the team.

"Last year we really didn't have anyone we could look to for quick scoring," he said. "Now, with Eric (Watson) and Tom (Alfaro), we have the opportunity to score more and that adds fire to our offense."

Joining Roder in double figures were Watson with 17, Mitchell and Alfaro with 16 apiece and Elder with 11.

"I would have liked to use more people," Hartman said. "It was a tight ball game and I just can't run people in and out of there. Jim's got to take charge like he did in the second half. He has leadership qualities and we need that on the floor. Tom has got to get some points for us. No question, he had a good ballgame. Eddie Elder got 10 tough rebounds and Ben Mitchell had some tough rebounds, too."

Jenkins paces 'Cats in win over Shockers

By VIKKI WATSON
Staff Writer

A sluggish first half, combined with poor rebounding and a low free throw percentage was enough to slow, but not stop, K-State's ninth-ranked women's basketball team as they grabbed a 68-53 victory over the winless Wichita State University Shockers.

The Wildcats led only 32-24 after the first half and suffered not only offensive problems but defensive difficulties as well, according to Lynn Hickey, head coach.

"We had a very slow start," she said. "Our defensive intensity was slow, and we had a lot of trouble on the boards."

Sophomore Tina Dixon led K-State in the rebounding department with 15 of the squad's 43 rebounds. A shorter Shocker squad equaled the 'Cats' rebounding output with 43 of their own.

In addition to her rebounding honors, Dixon added 11 points, behind three field goals and a five-of-eight showing from the charity line. She followed sophomores Sheronda Jenkins and Cassandra Jones, who finished with 13 and 12 points respectively. Junior Angie Bonner added 10 to the K-State cause.

K-State, which shot 50 percent from the field, made only 48 percent of their free throws as compared to 53 percent for WSU. The Shockers shot only 38 percent from the floor, however.

K-State, which recently captured its own Converse Little Apple Classic championship, now has an 8-0 mark and will face Northwestern University Dec. 3 at Evanston, Ill.

Convicted players' complaints unfounded

Drugs again have infiltrated the professional sports world, but this time the judicial system has taken action against the perpetrators for violating the law.

A federal judge, noting a professional athlete's "special place in society," sentenced All-Star centerfielder Willie Wilson, first baseman Willie Aikens and outfielder Jerry Martin to three months in prison and fined them up to $5,000 after the three pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor charge of attempting to purchase cocaine.

Wilson and Aikens were fined the maximum $5,000, and Martin was fined $2,500 after his lawyer told the judge that his client was close to "financial catastrophe."

In addition, Aikens and Martin have been informed by the Royals' front office that they will no longer be with the team next season.

Prosecutors said in open court last month that FBI wiretaps had intercepted the three players trying to buy cocaine last June from a residence in suburban Johnson County.

It has been recommended by the court that the players be sent to the federal prison in Fort Worth, Texas, to spend three months participating in its drug rehabilitation program. The judge said the sentences would be served at another prison or federal corrections facility with a drug treatment program if the one at Fort Worth is filled.

Pitcher Vida Blue, 34, who has pleaded guilty to possession of three grams of cocaine and faces the same penalties, has been granted a request for the delay of his sentencing until Dec. 5.

SEAN REILLY
Sports Editor

What irritates me concerning this incident involving the Royals players is the attitude the players are displaying.

Wilson's remark probably sums up the feeling of those convicted.

"They made an example out of me," Wilson said after leaving the courtroom.

Wilson's lawyer, David Russell, contends that the judge sentenced Wilson because the courtroom was full of media, not because of the crime he committed.

"You guys win," Russell told a cluster of reporters. "He gave you what you wanted. He didn't sentence like a judge. He abided by the media. There's no justification for what he did."

These "convicts" should be thankful they were not charged with violating the state law, under which Wilson, Aikens and Martin could have faced harsher charges. What they did, according to state standards, would not have been considered a misdemeanor. Rather, they would have been subjected to a possible two to three years in prison.

I believe that the judge did not take into consideration their job status and then sentence them. No, I believe he viewed them as individuals who have become dependent upon a drug now engulfing nearly every facet of life.

The fact they have been sentenced to the Fort Worth facility, which is a minimum-security institution, they should be thankful. The prisoners are not locked into cells, although units containing the rooms are locked at night.

During the hearing, Russell said Wilson's elevated place in society because of his athletic abilities "doesn't mean he has any more understanding of the system or intelligence than the average person."

He asked the judge to view Wilson "as an ordinary defendant," noting his client plans to take part and assist in drug prevention and rehabilitation programs.

My question to Wilson, Aikens and Martin and their lawyers: What would have happened to the "ordinary individual" had they been in your shoes? I say all should be treated equally, but I doubt that the man off the street would have received three months in a "hotel."

It is a shame that prominent big-time athletes, who are heroes of many youngsters and adults alike, make mistakes. But we are all human beings, and we should all be subjected to the same circumstances — especially in court procedures.

County to sell repossessed land at tax foreclosure auction today

By ANDY OSTMEYER
Staff Writer

Citizens of Riley County will have the chance to purchase property today at lower-than-normal prices.

The county will be selling property to the highest bidder in a tax foreclosure auction at 9 a.m. in front of the Riley County Courthouse, 5th and Poyntz Ave.

When taxes are not paid by the owner, a lien is placed on the property for the amount owed, County Counselor Dan Myers said. A lien is the right to hold and sell property on which money is owed.

If the taxes are not paid within the next three years, the property becomes eligible to be sold at public auction.

The property doesn't have to sell for the amount of the delinquent taxes, but once it is sold to the highest bidder, the previous debts are eliminated, Myers said. The owner of the property is not eligible to buy the property back or have a representative buy it for him, Myers said.

The money collected goes into the general county fund and any money collected above the amount owed is given to the original owner, he added.

Myers said this type of sale usually "creates a flurry of activity" among people who want to buy property at a low rate.

None of the property to be auctioned has any habitable structures, Myers said. Myers added that a lot of the property is by Tuttle Creek and didn't develop to the potential which the original owner intended.

Often owners determine that the market value will not support the value of the taxes, Myers said.

Most of the valuable property is usually paid for by the before the sale, or someone will offer to pay off the delinquent taxes if the deed is turned over to them, he said.

The owners have up until the minute of the sale to pay any back taxes.

This is the third foreclosure sale since 1976 and Myers said the amount of property in this sale exceeds either of the two previous ones.

The increase in properties to be auctioned is due to the high cost of new construction, Myers said. The decline of interest in developing lake property is partially due to the increasing cost of commuting to Manhattan, he said.

Big Lakes Developmental Center's horticulture therapy program teaches its clients basic horticultural skills. Jeff Fonce is one of the clients who learns about himself and nature by working with plants at the Throckmorton greenhouse.

Disabled find hope in center's plant program

By CATHY KARLIN
Features Editor

(This is the second of a three-part series about the programs and services offered to the developmentally disabled by Big Lakes Developmental Center.)

He was rather shy, averting his face to look at his teacher as he spoke. But Russ Foster never stopped smiling as he described his job at the Throckmorton greenhouse.

"I learn to keep bugs off of the plants. Learn not to get — don't let dirt go out of the bottom (of plants) onto the floor. Don't overwater plants," he said.

Foster, 23, is one of a group of developmentally disabled persons in the horticulture therapy program offered by Big Lakes Developmental Center, 1500 Hayes Drive. The group travels by van from the Big Lakes center to the greenhouse four mornings each week. Once there, they work in conjunction with the K-State horticulture therapy department to learn basic horticulture skills such as watering, fertilizing, potting and propagating plants.

Through working with the plants the clients learn much about themselves and nature, Laura Baker, Big Lakes horticultural therapist, said.

"Horticulture therapy is a universal medium because it touches something in all of us, be it nature, caretaking, cycles of life...the list varies with each individual and what they personally derive from it," she said.

"It helps clients deal with their feelings about themselves and the world around them. It increases their awareness of what's beyond themselves and in the world," she continued.

Because they get paid by the hour, working at the greenhouse is an actual job for the clients, Baker said. They also earn money at their plant sales held monthly at University For Man facilities and at monthly Big Lakes craft sales. Clients sell hanging baskets and plants such as Swedish ivy, aloe vera, Christmas cactuses, poinsettias, and bridal veil.

"The University keeps us supplied with soil, pots and flats. In return, the University gets a certain percentage of our plant sales," Baker said.

Three or four clients work at each plant sale, which helps mainstream them into society, Baker said.

"They are required to go up and say, 'Can I help you?' to customers. They also can explain how to take care of the plants. The clients learn about making change with money. There is also a camaraderie between those that go, a lot of fellowship between them," she said.

Clients also receive much-needed reinforcement when plant customers compliment the sellers on the beautiful plants, she added.

"They need to feel important just as you and I feel important," Baker explained.

Horticulture therapy is only one of the programs Big Lakes offers to assure every adult person the right to dignified work.

Dixie King, Big Lakes workshop manager, said most of the approximately 70 clients are mentally retarded. Some suffer from cerebral palsy, emotional disabilities, impaired vision, or brain damage from accidents. Big Lakes offers Work Training and Job Readiness Training at its two adult training centers in Manhattan and Clay Center. They also offer academic training, recreation, transportation, counseling and other services to the developmentally disabled in Riley, Geary, Clay and Pottawatomie counties.

Upon admission to Big Lakes, clients go through a 30-day evaluation period. They participate in all the workshop areas they can, such as assembly of wooden equipment, cutting wood, woodworking and crafts, pattern sorting and horticulture therapy.

Each workshop area has a vocational instructor, who must collect data on the client's performance. After 30 days, Big Lakes staff, the client and his parents, and any other involved person meet to establish the client's Individual Program Plan. The IPP outlines goals and determines where the client is best suited to work.

Workshops bid competitively for contracts in the community, and clients are paid on an hourly basis. Big Lakes contracts include lawn maintenance for the Riley County Police Department, janitorial work at the Corps of Engineers, metal work for Clay Center Motor Salvage, and paper sorting and recycling for The McCall Pattern Co.

"It increases their (clients') self-esteem, to earn their own living and be taxpayers, to have their own choice in some things," King said. "The training is not just vocational. They learn socialization, appropriate behavior in public.

"I've been here 6½ years. Sometimes you think they're never going to change. But you do see change, sometimes not in one year or two but in three or four," she said.

Some clients remain working indefinitely through Big Lakes Work Training. Others, who Big Lakes evaluators decide are nearly ready for outside employment, proceed to Job Readiness Training.

Alice Purvis, training and placement coordinator, said clients are coached in areas such as how to dress and act at job interviews and to read help-wanted ads. Purvis then helps them to be placed in an actual job, and communicates with the client and employer for a year after placement.

"We're not going to throw them out into the cold. We keep pretty close contact the first three months, then once a month we contact client and employer throughout the year," Purvis said.

Baker explained that most of the clients are not as task-oriented as most non-disabled people. Instead, the clients are much more conscious of people's emotions.

"They deal with a lot of the things with the heart. They are not consumed with (thinking) 'there are 40 plants I need to get potted!' I have a hard time saying we function on a higher level because they don't get all caught up in things which, in the end, won't matter anyway," Baker said.

President revives civil rights panel

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan revived the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights on Wednesday after waiting until virtually the last moment to sign legislation reducing his power to influence the panel.

Reagan named the commission's last chairman, Clarence M. Pendleton, to serve on the reconstituted panel and said outgoing staff director Linda Chavez should resume her position, although her appointment is subject to concurrence by the full commission.

Technically, the commission died at midnight Tuesday. The bill signed by Reagan revives it, but with greater congressional — and less presidential — control over its makeup.

In its final report reviewing the course of civil rights during the commission's history, the panel said, "Most of the legislation necessary to guarantee civil rights to women, to the nation's racial, ethnic and religious minorities and to its older and handicapped persons has already been enacted," with the notable exception of the Equal Rights Amendment.

But it called for continued vigilance by the federal government, saying the consequences of its failure to guarantee the rights of the ancestors of slavery "continue to haunt this country today."

"In this context," the commissioners said in their 82-page report, "the commission believes the national interest compels the continuing existence of an independent, bipartisan federal agency mandated to appraise civil rights issues and progress throughout the nation and to recommend to the president and Congress, without regard to political considerations, steps it believes necessary to ensure equal opportunity for all Americans."

Reagan, frustrated by the Senate's refusal to confirm his choices for commission membership, precipitated a crisis by firing three Democratic members of the six-member panel last month. That left the panel without a quorum and legally powerless to meet, and it infuriated members of the House and Senate alike who accused Reagan of trying to thwart the will of Congress.

To head off a move that would have established the commission as an arm of the Congress, Reagan agreed to a compromise that expands the commission membership to eight members, who will serve staggered, six-year terms. But the president, who previously had named all six members of the panel, then would be able to appoint only four. The speaker of the House and majority leader of the Senate each will name two.

Reagan also was forced to surrender his authority to fire any commissioners, except for malfeasance or neglect of duty. And, further diluting the president's influence over panel activities, Reagan would have to let the commission select its own chairman and vice chairman, whereas previous presidents designated the panel's leadership.

Reagan will have the authority to appoint the staff director, subject to the concurrence of the commission.

It was not known Wednesday whether Reagan would reappoint some of his earlier choices to the new commission.

When the panel expired, it consisted of Chairman Clarence M. Pendleton Jr. and Vice Chairman Mary Louise Smith, both Reagan appointees; Blandina Cardenas Ramirez, Mary Frances Berry and Rabbi Murray Saltzman, the three Reagan sought to fire; and Jill Ruckelshaus.

The commissioners Reagan sought to fire were temporarily reinstated by a federal court order after Berry and Ramirez challenged the president's authority to dismiss them. But the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia threw out the case Wednesday, saying the death of the commission made the issue moot.

Bus rams rear of truck; six die in muddy creek

By The Associated Press

LIVINGSTON, Texas — A Continental Trailways bus that police think was speeding rammed the rear of a truck before dawn Wednesday and plunged 40 feet into a muddy creek, killing six passengers and injuring the driver and the five others aboard.

"The bus was traveling at, in my opinion, an excessive speed," said state Trooper David Sandlin, who was in charge of the investigation. "It didn't fall down into the creek like a heavy bus like that would — it flew over the top of it. It hit the opposite bank.

Several of the passengers were pinned in the mangled wreckage for 90 minutes as rescue workers cut the top off the bus and climbed inside, officials said.

Four people, including the driver, were taken 75 miles by helicopter to a Houston hospital after the 5:30 a.m. accident five miles north of this southeastern Texas city.

Truck driver Richard Paloma Garcia, 43, of Livingston, said he had just pulled out from his home on U.S. 59 when he was hit in the rear. He was not injured, and said he ran down the embankment to the bus.

"Everything down there was quiet. I talked to one lady and asked if they needed any help and she said some people were hurt," Garcia said. "They weren't talking. They weren't in any shape to talk."

Garcia said he ran back to the road and tried to hail help from passing cars, but none would stop. "You can't see it (the bus) from the road. I just wanted to get someone to help me. It was dark and I was flashing my light and no one would stop," he said.

Garcia said he then ran a half-mile back to his house and called the sheriff's department. He was the first person to notify authorities.

A National Transportation Safety Board team would investigate the crash, authorities said.

Trailways spokeswoman Tricha Barnett in Dallas said company officials would also investigate.

"At the moment, we don't have any indication on exactly what happened, on who hit who, or if the driver was speeding or if there was mechanical failure," she said.

Trailways said the bus was not one of those that have been added to carry extra traffic since Greyhound buses were struck by drivers Nov. 2.

Reagan dooms ties on Salvadoran aid

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan, ignoring appeals from the State Department, on Wednesday killed legislation that would have tied continued military aid for El Salvador to its progress on human rights and land reform.

Reagan doomed the bill through a "pocket veto" — allowing a midnight deadline for his signature to lapse.

Even so, White House spokesman Larry Speakes said the administration was "firmly committed to the protection of human rights, economic and political reforms, the holding of elections and progress in prosecuting the cases of murdered American citizens in El Salvador."

Speakes said that even without the law, the administration would provide periodic reports to Congress on the "political, economic and military situation in El Salvador." But he did not say that such reports would specifically incorporate the human rights issue.

Earlier, officials who spoke on condition they not be identified said Reagan's objections stemmed from his opposition to congressional constraints on his authority to conduct foreign policy and from concern that the legislation would undercut the U.S. commitment to help El Salvador in its fight against leftist guerrillas.

The bill, sent to Reagan by the Senate on a virtually unanimous voice vote Nov. 17, would revive a law that tied continued military aid to El Salvador to a presidential finding every six months that the Salvadoran government was making a "concerted" effort to respect human rights, achieving progress on political and land reforms, trying to bring to justice the killers of eight Americans, and seeking an end to the civil war.

Under that law, which expired Sept. 30, the administration certified four times over the past two years that the Salvadoran government met the requirements for military aid. Congress has approved $64 million in military aid for El Salvador in fiscal 1984, which began Oct. 1.

Congress will not reconvene until Jan. 23, and could then resubmit the legislation.

Purchasers speculate at county's tax foreclosure auction

By WAYNE PRICE
Collegian Reporter

At first it would seem a real bargain, sections of land selling for as low as $5 in some cases, but purchasers at this "land grab," at the Riley County Court House Wednesday, were buying property that had already proved to be unprofitable for the previous owners.

What was actually taking place was a tax foreclosure auction conducted by Riley County.

About 35 people attended the auction, which, County Counselor Dan Myers said netted about $24,000 from the 147 tracts of land sold. The tracts for sale included flat lake-front property and even a section of land which was beneath a river.

Many buyers were from other counties around Kansas, while a few were from different states.

One such buyer was Bill Crichfield, a realtor from Bartlesville, Okla. Crichfield said he has spent the last 10 years attending foreclosure auctions throughout the United States. He said he has made purchases from Wichita, Kansas City, Topeka and Independence, Mo.

"You don't make a whole lot, but you have a lot of fun," Crichfield said. "The fun part is buying the property and making everyone else buy the property."

"If I wasn't there to help them once in a while, they'd get it (property) for nothing."

Crichfield said he spent a little over $1,000 and purchased 46 lots of property, most of it being lake-front and in quarter-acre plots. He doesn't seem worried that the land proved unprofitable for someone else.

"I can sell them and I can trade them," Crichfield said. "Anything close to a lake I can sell."

He said lake lots, like some of the ones purchased from Bridgeview Heights and Lakeside Heights, sell to people in New York and California for the simple reason that people want something different. People in Kansas would like a nice spot in the Rocky Mountains, while people in the hills like the flatland, he said.

Even though he says he doesn't make much, he says he thinks buying land is profitable.

"If it's cheap, you can never buy enough," Crichfield said. "If it's high, you have too much already."

"Selling vacuums was more profitable," said Crichfield, who once sold vacuum cleaners, "but if you don't like what you do, why do it?"

As reported in Wednesday's Collegian, Myers said a possible reason for the declining interest in developing lake property may be due to the increasing cost of commuting to Manhattan.

When the property is purchased, all previous debts are cancelled, and the new owner pays the property taxes from Nov. 1 of the year in which the land was bought.

Crichfield said the yearly taxes on the property purchased Wednesday will be a little over $1,000, "just like what I paid for it."

Auto lot burglarized

During the week of Nov. 19, two vehicles parked at Bittersweet Auto Farms were burglarized. Both vehicles had been left unlocked and were parked in the rear portion of the lot, which is located on K-18 southwest of Manhattan.

A set of stereo speakers was removed from the rear deck of one vehicle, along with an in-dash stereo unit. A Pioneer AM-FM cassette was removed from the dashboard of the other vehicle.

During the past few months there have been several reports of thefts and burglaries at the farm involving tires, wheels, stereos, speakers and one car. Total loss in these incidents amounts to several thousand dollars.

Anyone with any information on these or any other crimes should call Crime Stoppers at 539-7777. Callers will remain anonymous and those who provide information may qualify for a cash reward of up to $1,000.

Fraternity leads toy search

By KELLY CARLSON
Collegian Reporter

Most people consider Christmas to be the most joyous of holidays, but needy children may think of Christmas as being like any other day of the year.

Through a toy drive sponsored by the Sigma Nu fraternity many area children will have a chance to experience the Christmas season.

Once the toys are collected, the fraternity will donate them to the Manhattan Regional Crisis Center who in turn will give them to needy children in Manhattan, said Scott Tucker, senior in finance and co-chairman of the drive.

"Many of these kids are from broken homes and single-parent homes and have never had the chance to experience a real Christmas," Tucker said.

"The purpose of our toy drive is to allow the less-fortunate children in Manhattan to enjoy the Christmas season like the rest of us do. We thought that a toy drive was the best thing that we could do for these kids," he said.

Toys can be donated by bringing them to the fraternity at 513 Sunset Ave. through Dec. 12 or by calling 539-2354 for toys to be picked up.

Man dies in electric chair despite papal plea

By The Associated Press

STARKE, Fla. — Robert Sullivan, a convicted murderer who spent 10 years on death row, was executed in Florida's electric chair Wednesday after reciting a psalm in tears and thanking Pope John Paul II for trying to save his life.

Sullivan, 36, his blue eyes watering, sat in the oaken death chair, took a microphone and read in a clear voice from the 62nd Psalm written on a legal pad: "And in God alone is my soul at rest, because my hope comes from within."

A black hood was placed over his head and the executioner, also wearing a black hood, threw a switch sending 2,000 volts of electricity through Sullivan's body for two minutes.

Sullivan twitched, then was still. He was pronounced dead at 10:16 a.m., six minutes after Gov. Bob Graham gave the go-ahead for the execution, ending a week of frantic legal maneuvering that reached to the U.S. Supreme Court and won the condemned man a brief stay.

Florida thus became the first state to have executed two people since the Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty seven years ago. Eight other Americans, all men, have been executed since the landmark decision.

Sullivan, a Roman Catholic, spent 10 years on death row and attempts by lawyers and death penalty foes, and ultimately the pope, carried on until the last moments of his life.

"To all my peers on death row, despite what is about to happen to me, do not quit," Sullivan said. He also thanked the pope for "his personal intervention asking that my life be spared."

"I hold malice to none. May God bless us all," were his last words.

Sullivan was sentenced to death for the April 9, 1973 robbery and murder of Donald Schmidt, an assistant manager at a Howard Johnson's restaurant in Homestead, south of Miami.

Schmidt's credit cards and watch were found on Sullivan when he was arrested. Sullivan contended he was at a homosexual bar 40 miles away at the time of the murder and had witnesses to prove it.

The body was shipped to Nashua, N.H. The whereabouts of his adoptive father, a Harvard-educated surgeon, and his mother, was unknown. The couple is divorced.

The body was shipped to Nashua, N.H., where his adoptive father, Dr. Daniel Sullivan, a surgeon, died about five years ago. The elder Sullivan and his wife Stella were divorced when Robert was a child.

In Arlington, Mass., Mrs. Sullivan would not answer her doorbell. "I'm sorry, I cannot talk to you," she told a reporter over the phone. A woman identifying herself only as the owner of the apartment complex where Mrs. Sullivan lives said: "She's taking it the way you'd expect someone to take it. She knew this was going to happen. She's OK, somebody's with her."

Late Monday, a federal appeals court and later the Supreme Court, refused to spare Sullivan's life. A final appeal to the Florida Supreme Court and the federal appeals court, claiming electrocution constituted cruel and unusual punishment, was rejected in the morning.

Graham, on an open telephone line with the prison, told Superintendent Richard Dugger that the last appeal had failed at 10:10 a.m. "There are no stays. God save us all," Graham said, as quoted by his general counsel, Sydney McKenzie.

Vatican Radio reported the execution without comment.

Marines face third day of shelling in Lebanon

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Shellfire closed Beirut airport Wednesday, and Druse gunners threatened fierce attacks on Lebanese army positions at the terminal, harbor, power stations, schools and peacekeeping bases.

No casualties were reported at the airport, where the U.S. Marine base came under shelling for a third day, but Druse attacks on army positions in Christian east Beirut Tuesday killed six civilians and wounded 30.

In a written statement, the Progressive Socialist Party of Druse leader Walid Jumblatt accused the Lebanese army and Christian militias in Beirut of shelling Druse mountain villages.

It demanded they dismantle their batteries and clear out of positions protecting the airport, the harbor, power stations, schools and from multinational peacekeeping force garrisons.

The Druse statement urged civilians to avoid army and Christian militia garrisons and vehicles "because they are all going to be the target of fire."

Later at least two warplanes that observers identified as U.S. A-7s roared over Beirut and the surrounding hills. But the private Central News Agency said they were Lebanese Hawker Hunter jets on training flights.

Elsewhere, Beirut radio said Druse gunners pounded the Lebanese army garrison at Souk el-Gharb in the mountains above the Marine positions.

Beirut radio also reported fresh clashes in Tripoli between Palestinian supporters and Syrian-backed opponents of Yasser Arafat's leadership of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Arafat said in an interview with

The Associated Press and other reporters that Syria was massing new forces in the Tripoli area for a resumption of the offensive against him that started Nov. 3.

Meanwhile, Lebanese President Amin Gemayel was flying to Washington, where he is expected to seek President Reagan's support for changing or renegotiating the May 17 Israeli-Lebanese troop withdrawal agreement.

Syria and its Lebanese allies — the Shiites and Druse — have called for tearing up the accord because of concessions it grants Israel in return for the pullout of all Israeli troops.

Safety commission issues holiday toy warning

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Consumer Product Safety Commission on Wednesday urged parents embarking on their annual Christmas buying spree to read toy labels closely and leave on store shelves any toys with sharp edges, long strings or small parts that come loose easily.

"When shopping, become a label reader. Look for and heed age recommendations," said commission chairman Nancy Harvey Steorts.

"When purchasing (a toy), take the time to take it out of the box. Examine it. Feel for sharp edges and points that could cut," added commissioner Terence M. Scanlon.

"The kind of injury we see, day in and day out, ought to and can be avoided by proper maintenance, supervision, storage and especially selection of toys," said commissioner Stuart M. Statler.

The commissioners held a news conference before traveling across the country to stress the role of parents in toy safety during the holiday season, which accounts for 60 percent of the $6 billion in annual U.S. toy sales.

Steorts said the commission's decade-long campaign to improve toy safety in America is succeeding.

Last year, 123,000 toy-related injuries were reported to the commission, 23,000 fewer than in 1977.

She attributed part of the decline to product improvements by manufacturers. Today, she said, many of the reported injuries involve not defective toys but misuse of toys, particularly children playing with products designed for older ages.

Thus, said Steorts, parents should choose the right toy for a child and make sure it is maintained and used correctly. The first step is to read labels.

Doug Thomson, president of the Toy Manufacturers of America, said

90 percent of toys on the market carry labels suggesting the appropriate age of children using them.

Statler said some parents may look for a toy recommended for children older than theirs, hoping for example that it will challenge the ability of a toddler.

But that toy might be hazardous for a too-young child, who might choke on small parts or strangle on a cord, he said.

The commissioners warned parents to avoid toys with sharp edges or points, long strings and small parts that can come loose and choke a youngster.

TKC 83 This conference will help ignite a spiritual revolution among students that could alter the course of history.

"A CONVICTION IS developing among Christian college students today. It's a conviction that says, 'Hey, if other people can assert their beliefs on campus, then why aren't we Christians doing the same?'"

—Josh McDowell

KC 83 is a once-in-a-lifetime experience and a major part of an historical movement. Up to 25,000 students and faculty from across our nation are gathering together in the unity of the Holy Spirit to learn how to make an eternal mark for Christ and how to see God's power unleashed on every campus, reaching every student.

There will be a cost, perhaps even a risk. However, the opportunity to bring others the hope of eternal life makes the costs look mighty pale by comparison. Join us at KC 83.

"One of the greatest forces for God in America today is Christian college and university students, joined together to see the world changed for Jesus Christ. This could well be the most significant decade in our history."

—Billy Graham

Some of the most influential people of our time will be speaking at KC 83:

Bill Bright is chairman of the national committee for "The Year of the Bible." He is founder and president of Campus Crusade for Christ International, now a worldwide movement. He inspires all who hear him as he communicates a love for the Lord and a vision for seeing the Great Commission fulfilled in this generation.

Billy Graham is a worldwide symbol of evangelism. Dr. Graham has preached the gospel to more people than anyone else in history. He has written many books and leads the weekly "Hour of Decision" radio program, which is broadcast by more than 550 stations around the world.

Crawford Lorita is a traveling speaker for Campus Crusade for Christ and national director of Here's Life, Black America, a nationwide movement to help saturate sections of metropolitan areas with the gospel and establish training in evangelism and discipleship. He was honored as one of the "Outstanding Young Men of America" in 1979 and 1980.

There is still time to be a part of the K-State delegation. Clip out and send in your registration now.

For more information call 539-3036.

Howard Hendricks is one of the most sought-after speakers in America today. He is professor of Christian Education at Dallas Theological Seminary and a featured speaker on the daily radio program, "The Art of Living."

Elizabeth Elliot is one of the most popular Christian writers of our time. She is a lecturer, teacher, best-selling author and currently writer-in-residence at Gordon College in Wenham, Massachusetts.

Josh McDowell is the most popular speaker on university campuses today. As a traveling lecturer with Campus Crusade, Josh has spoken to more than seven million students in over 62 countries. He has written several best-selling books and a television special called "The Secret of Loving."

Dr. Joon Gon Kim is the director of Campus Crusade for Christ's ministry in East Asia. Raised in a strict Confucianist home, Dr. Kim first heard about Jesus Christ in the third grade. He sought out a Christian church, and there became a Christian. During the Korean war, he witnessed the brutal murder of loved ones and faced persecution. But through it all, a desire burned in his heart to please God, to glorify His name and to do His will. Dr. Kim expects God to do great things, and this faith typifies his daily life.

Sandi Patti was selected as the 1982 Gospel Artist of the Year and the 1982 Female Vocalist of the Year. She has recorded three albums, with a fourth to be released in February 1983. As a powerful, vivacious performer, she shares from the heart the love of God and the joy of living as Jesus taught us to live.

Soul Liberation: Recording artists from Dallas, Texas. A popular music group with a contemporary style, Soul Liberation has thrilled audiences across the country with enthusiasm and spirit. Their warmth and excitement are welcomed both in churches and on university campuses.

Specialized seminars are optional and have been designed to provide input for your unique situation. They will show you how to:

• relate to parents

• gain a biblical perspective on sex, love and dating

Free money from Uncle Sam

Punish those who work and reward those who are content to sit idle.

This seems to be a popular idea in government today. We see it very clearly with unemployment benefits. While a person is unemployed, he at least collects enough unemployment to survive. But if he decides to be productive and get a job he loses the benefits, even if he is making less than what he was collecting under unemployment.

When dealing with the government, it does not pay to be productive.

The same is evidently true in the college setting. Consider the recent increase in the Pell Grant Fund. This in itself is not the issue. We believe it is about time the government began to put some more money into student financial aid, especially considering incessantly increasing tuition.

What we are concerned about is increasing Pell Grants while there exists a possible national cut in work-study funds. Even if this will not affect K-State, it is the government attitude that is at fault.

Work-study is much more beneficial in the long run to students. Not often in the "real world," outside the college atmosphere, do people receive free money. It is generally assumed that if one needs money, a job is the best way to get it.

Students need to be reminded that a college education is not guaranteed to anyone. It is a privilege and one that should be worked for, and not only through time spent in class.

Cutting work-study while raising the grant fund is comparable to the government saying to the student who asks for a job, "Sorry, I can't give you work, but I'll give you enough money to make up for it." Money put into work-study is beneficial in two ways: it provides money for students to go to school and results in productivity through the jobs. Grants only give students a free ride.

It is time to prepare students for life outside of college. There is not, or should not be, any free money. People work for a living and sometimes have to take on a greater work burden than they care to. But often this is necessary to make ends meet.

First pay the students who are willing to work their way through school. If there is anything left after that, give it to those who have the financial need.

Fighting alcohol ads

WASHINGTON — Billy Martin has antagonized many of those he's met in the baseball world. Now it seems that curse has inadvertently pursued the petulant New York Yankee manager into another occupation.

Along with an assortment of washed-out jocks, Martin has played his unruly self in television advertisements for Lite, the Miller Brewing Co.'s low-calorie beer. The Lite commercials' mixture of gags and locker-room bravado constitutes some of television's most popular entertainment today.

But their popularity has only fueled the anger and commitment of a growing movement to restrict alcohol promotions in the media. Last week, in fact, a coalition of 25 upstanding groups asked the Federal Trade Commission for a number of new curbs that would virtually ban many beer and wine ads. Unfortunately, no matter how one assesses Billy Martin's barroom antics, extremism in the defense of sobriety is as much a vice of alcohol as itself.

This isn't an attempt to ignore or trivialize the concern that drives the ban-the-booze-ad movement. Alcohol abuse or addiction afflicts an estimated 13 million Americans and, indirectly, an untold number of families. According to government figures, it's involved in more than half of the nation's murders, rapes, assaults, suicides and traffic deaths; by some estimates it costs the economy more than $100 billion yearly. For many people the concern is obvious.

"It's unconscionable to allow the continuation of massive promotions for alcoholic beverages that completely whitewash these tragic results," said David Greenberg of the Consumer Federation of America, one petitioning organization. To that end, Greenberg's and other groups want the FTC to prohibit all "youth-oriented" marketing of alcoholic beverages and all broadcast and print advertising aimed at or reaching large numbers of young people and heavy drinkers. The petitioners, which also include the Children's Foundation and National Women's Health Network, also would require that "balanced messages" accompany any advertisements permitted under the new standards.

MAXWELL GLEN

Such actions would probably affect not only Martin, former football terror Dick Butkus, comedian Rodney Dangerfield and the other celebrities who've made second careers in the $1-billion-a-year booze promotion business. Losers also would include the television networks, who earned more than $500 million on beer and wine advertising last year. There would be none of the beer-company-sponsored events that college students have come to consider part of their undergraduate experience. For their part, America's alcoholic beverage producers have indulged in a promotional orgy that's touched every facet of our culture and maximized virtually every stereotype.

Yet amid a wine glut and static beer sales (up only one-tenth of a percent last year), the promotional frenzy more likely reflects desperate competition for the drinker's dollar. Though the major U.S. brands of wine and beer would like to stress their difference in taste, it's jingles that divide the pack.

What's more, even George Hacker of the Center for Science in the Public Interest, which helped organize the anti-booze ad coalition, admits that the linkage between alcohol beverage advertising and alcohol-related tragedies "is difficult, if not impossible, to establish."

Of course, local interests may have the day when the Supreme Court decides next year on the constitutionality of an Oklahoma state ban against promotions for all alcoholic beverages but beer. Broadcasters and ad agency groups have mounted a major campaign to have the law voided on First Amendment grounds. But in Oklahoma and Mississippi, lower courts have determined that alcohol beverage advertising prohibitions are something for state — not national — governments to institute and enforce.

But however local interests fare in the courts, alcohol abuse isn't likely to go away. As the Soviets have found, it doesn't vanish in the absence of promotion. Even if Billy Martin and the others who peddle potions left Madison Avenue, their departure would make little difference in the grim statistics.

Rep. George Brown may have the most reasonable answer. Under legislation now before the House, the California Democrat would require that containers of high alcoholic beverages (more than 24 percent) carry a warning label that alludes to alcohol's potential hazards. Today, those hazards are sufficiently well-documented to make the buyer beware.

Senate and liver

The other day I heard a radio commercial promoting and defending the worthiness of liver. Liver, it reminded me of Student Senate.

Have you ever thought about how alike senate and liver are? I mean, how many times have you heard someone say, "Liver is honestly very good for you, and you should try it." But all it does is make you want to croak.

You think, "Liver, ugh, it was a vital functioning organ, and you want me to eat it?"

Well, speaking of "vital functioning organs," senate is one. And it is "honestly very good for you and you should try it" — no matter what the side effects.

Senate meets tonight. Like it has every Thursday this semester. Like it will every Thursday next semester.

But tonight is its last meeting this semester. And this is my last senate complimentary column.

I've attended senate meetings all semester on a surprisingly "volunteer" basis. I mean, even the senators' attendance is "enforced." The meetings have not only been amusing, but somewhat informative. And if you can sort through all the bull, you can pick up on some very interesting issues.

One issue that they always discuss is communicating with the "student body" (that's you). Although they say they want to "communicate" with "the students," they certainly seem to want to get rid of those cute, generic-style student senator buttons.

Last week they discussed the abolishment of the button. Some senators seemed to think that the buttons are serving no purpose since they haven't been flocked by thousands of eager, communicative students demanding to share their views and opinions.

Well, maybe the students haven't wanted to get that close to them, but at least the students know that senators really do exist after elections.

The buttons identify the senators on Thursdays. Without the buttons they can once again disappear into the student body, unbeknownst to all — until next elections.

EDEE DALKE
Collegian Columnist

Perhaps that would be best. It would be, if they didn't have the responsibility that they do. But face it, Student Governing Association alone can make you pay more or less money, can say that you (the student body) endorse or support something and can decide which groups get financial backing.

When we elected the senators to office, we were saying that THEY can speak for US. They have that responsibility.

So maybe it isn't such a bad idea to try senate.

Not that you should BECOME a senator, but that you should try to watch what the senators do with your money and what they support.

To their credit, they have endorsed the KSU Policy Prohibiting Sexual Harassment, supported the Smith House, proclaimed the KSU Alcohol and Drug Awareness Week and allotted financial support to many beneficial organizations.

Even senate meetings aren't all that bad — if you like stand up comedy. All semester it's been like a "theater-in-the-round" starring: The Politician, The Diplomat, Napoleon, Lucy, Richard Nixon, Ginger and Mary Ann, Chip and Dale, Mary Worth, The Conservative, The Boy Wonder, GQ, Taco, Spike, and the Urban Cowchip...er boy.

Now to match character to personality, I'm afraid you're going to have to sit through a semester's worth of senate meetings.

And through covering senate issues, I have seen that many senators earned valid respect. Others affirmed my belief that they are worms.

Yet others just deserve to be given the "E.F. Hutton Award" because when they speak, everyone listens — of course it would be the first thing they said in a meeting all semester.

But anyway, back to senate's likeness to liver. Liver, you see is full of iron — and iron makes you stong. Senate also is full of a lot of things — nevertheless, paying attention to its dealings can strengthen your stand on important campus issues.

So whether it's liver or senate, both can be incorporated into your life. And actually, it's really all in the recipe. If you know how to treat it, it can be tolerated.

And speaking of tolerating, if the Manhattan city newspaper, (what's its name again?) can grace its editorial page with what it calls "Roses and Road Apples," then I think our senate has earned its "Liver and Onions."

So with the strength that liver gives and the turnoff of onions, Student Senate, here are your liver and onions:

Liver to Bill Sullivan, who can ask intelligent questions.

Onions to senators who repeat questions.

Liver to reporter Bill Roy, who covers senate for KSDB.

Onions to "the senator" who "advertises" KSDB in senate.

Liver to Lori Leu for an outstanding job that goes a bit unnoticed sometimes.

Onions to senators who must do outrageous things to get noticed.

Liver to Mark Jones, who's concerned with student input.

Onions to the senators who will try to ban the cute button.

Liver to the Finance Committee for the time its members give.

Onions to the senators who don't give time.

Liver to senators who read columns with a "grain of salt."

And onions to senators who grudgingly and closed-mindedly take columns only to heart.

Heart...now that reminds me of the Administration. Have you ever thought about how alike...

Silly questions in public service

If you've never worked with the public, you should. Only then can you understand all the dumb things people say.

Let me give you a few examples. This is the kind of stuff I've been putting up with for over a year. If you are one of these people, please forgive me, but you have to learn to laugh at yourself.

A customer comes in the store, looks around, and asks if I'm a post office. Now I realize I am no fashion model, but really, do I look like a post office?

Then she asks, "Do you sell stamps?" Gee, I didn't know that a post office sold stamps. I always thought we just mailed packages. Oh well, you learn something new every day.

Well, the post office does sell stamps, of course, and for those who haven't written home to Mom for the last two years, they cost 20 cents now, and have for the last two years. I can't tell you the number of people who can't figure out that five 20-cent stamps cost $1. I know it's tough to figure that out, but please, let's give it the old college try.

To some people, stamps are kind of interesting. They come in all sizes, shapes and colors. Some people like stamps so well they have books of them. Others haven't seen a stamp for quite a while. Some people are really picky about postage stamps. Some want "pretty ones" while others want little ones so they don't have to lick so much. Some want certain corners from the sheet, others want the stamps from the middle of the sheet. Some don't care

DARCY WARD
Collegian Columnist

— now those are my kind of people.

Then there are the people who buy the stamps and expect me to put them on the letters. Sorry, it's not in my job description. I don't lick them; I just sell them.

If this isn't enough to make you wonder about the consumer, let's go for the gusto. There he is, in all his glory, the postman. Standing right out in plain sight (you can tell him apart from every one else because he has the blue uniform on with an emblem that has an image of an eagle and reads U.S. Post Office). It never fails that some person comes up to the counter and asks, "Has the postman been here yet?"

Just once I wanted to say, "No lady, the man standing behind me isn't the postman, he's just the janitor, wearing a postman's uniform."

But I didn't. I just smiled and said, "He's here right now," while under my breath I wondered why they didn't put this post office somewhere I can't mention in this column.

Let us not forget the Christmas rush. The Christmas rush differs from all other holidays only in its magnitude. With each holiday the load of mail gets a bit heavier. It all starts with Valentine's Day, then Easter, Mother's Day, Father's Day, the Fourth of July, Halloween, Thanksgiving and finally Christmas.

My fondest memory is of the little old lady who rushes in on Christmas eve with a package addressed to some podunk town nobody ever heard of and asks me if I think it will get there by tomorrow. I just told her it depends on how fast the horse goes. Only the Pony Express goes on Christmas Day.

Another great question is the difference between first class and third class (parcel post). I don't mind telling anybody anything the first three times, but after that, they're on their own. If you can't get it the third time, you'll just have to take your chances. Trust me, it will get there — someday.

I know you're thinking, "If she doesn't like working with the public, she ought to quit." But I really do like the public, and for each airhead I meet, there are 10 fun people who really are nice to wait on. People are fun, especially the ones who ask silly questions.

Actually, if the truth be known, I've probably asked more silly questions in my lifetime than anyone else.

So for all the airheads out there who ask silly questions, go ahead, we all need a few laughs in our lives — especially when you work with the public.

Student opts for back roads tour of European countries

By WAYNE PRICE
Collegian Reporter

Summer is a time when most students settle into summer jobs or plan a trip somewhere within the United States. However, Melanie Lees, senior in English, decided to spend her vacation traveling the back roads of Europe.

"What I really wanted to do was to get a look at different cultures and see some of the things that go on in different countries," Lees said.

Lees began her adventure last May with a friend from Canada. The two boarded a jet from an Icelandic airline company and flew to Luxembourg.

After arriving in Luxembourg, Lees and her friend began travels which included riding trains, backpacking and hitchhiking. At the end of six weeks they had visited Belgium, England, Switzerland, Austria, France and Italy.

Lees said a person can travel very comfortably on $2,000, as she did, which included rail passes, lodging, meals and airline tickets.

Like Lees, many students who travel through Europe make use of the youth hostel program. Hostels provide overnight housing at rates between $10 and $15, and are found at various locations throughout Europe.

"Overall, I would say they were comfortable," she said. "There is kind of a universal bathroom but they were pretty nice."

Lees said she was told that she took her trip at a good time because of the high value of the U.S. dollar abroad.

Interested students can go the Union Program Council to get a student universal identification card which permits the cardholder to receive many discounts in Europe. UPC also has information on the hostel program.

Lees said her knowledge of Italian and her friend's ability to speak French was beneficial — but not essential — in their travels.

"Most people there are bilingual," she said. "Most people know enough English that it's not a hassle at all."

Heinz Bulmahn, associate professor of modern languages and native of Germany, also said that knowledge of the language is not a necessity but it does help identify with the culture, especially when a person is backpacking or traveling through smaller communities not on a pre-designed tourist route.

"If you don't know the language it might be an enormous shock to you," Bulmahn said. "It doesn't mean you can't travel without it but you really can't take in the culture."

If a person wants a better look at a country's culture it is very helpful to get away from the pre-designed tourist route.

"A Holiday Inn in this country is very much the same as a Holiday Inn in Germany," Bulmahn said.

Bulmahn said he has always made the assumption that the two countries are more alike than different. It's the subtle differences that can be noticed by knowing the language, he explained.

Lees said backpacking and riding the train gave her the chance to see many types of Europeans. People who tour from hotel to hotel are usually the upper-class people, she said.

Hitchhiking gave Lees and her friend a chance to meet people who told them about the small, out-of-the-way places where tourists don't usually go. Meeting other people from the United States was another advantage to backpacking, she said, because it was fun to relate each other's experiences.

Home heating aid plan starts operation today

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A federally funded program to help low-income, elderly and disabled Kansans pay their winter heating and fuel bills will be implemented today by the state welfare agency.

The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services will begin taking applications for the program, called the Low Income Energy Assistance Program or LIEAP, from people who need help paying their heating bills this winter. Applications were automatically sent to last year's LIEAP participants but others who feel they are eligible for the assistance are encouraged to apply.

The state expects the federal government to make available between $15 million and $16 million for the energy program, said Aileen Whitfill, an SRS executive.

Of that amount, up to 15 percent can be dedicated to funding weatherization projects, 10 percent will be used as social service grants to child care homes, nursing homes and other welfare recipients, and a final 10 percent will pay the administrative costs of the program.

That leaves about $10.3 million for the winter phase of the energy income assistance and some $3 million for summer cooling programs.

Whitfill said SRS hopes to serve about 55,000 Kansas homes this winter, as compared to the 43,300 households which received payments last winter.

Depending on eligibility, a family which pays for its heating bills directly, or through rent payments, may receive up to a $501 maximum payment from LIEAP funding, Whitfill said. However, last winter the average payment was $187 per household for the entire winter.

"To be eligible, a family must have made some effort to pay their bills for their primary heating source in two of the last three months," Whitfill said. "There is no maximum amount which must be paid, but applicants must be able to show they made an effort to pay their bills."

To qualify for a LIEAP grant, a one-person household must have a total income in the last six months of less than $3876. A family of four must have a total income of less than $7,453 during the past six months to qualify for the aid.

The amount of individual grants will vary depending upon household income, geographic location, size and type of home and the fuel used to heat the home.

Once LIEAP applications are approved, checks will be made out to the eligible family and the utility or provider of primary heating fuel.

A similar program provided $2.2 million to help 20,000 Kansas households pay their summer utility bills and buy fans and air conditions to cool their homes during hot summer months.

Applications for LIEAP grants are available at all local SRS offices across the state.

Ex-cheerleader sues Wichita Wings

TOPEKA — A former cheerleader for Wichita's professional soccer team, the Wichita Wings, has filed a $200,000 lawsuit alleging that she was demoted, then cut from the cheerleading squad, because she was black.

The suit was filed Monday in U.S. District Court on behalf of 21-year-old Charmetrea LaNiece Dawson by Topeka attorney Fred Phelps Jr. No court dates have been set, a spokesman in the clerk's office said.

The suit named as defendants the cheerleading squad called the Angels; William Kentling, general manager of the Major Indoor Soccer League team, and Virginia Creamer, the team's director of operations.

The suit alleged that because she was black and had had a "friendly relationship" with one of the white soccer players, she was subject to verbal abuse and was demoted from the cheerleaders' starting squad of eight people to a backup squad of four. The suit contended the change was made to accommodate two white cheerleaders.

The suit said Ms. Dawson participated in routine tryouts in July for the 1983-84 cheerleading squad but was rejected.

Paper praises attorney general

MEDFORD, Mass. — A student newspaper has praised U.S. Attorney General William French Smith as "National Conservative of the Year" for prosecuting draft registration resisters, opposing school busing and cracking down on drug traffic.

Brian Kelley, a Tufts University junior and co-founder of the monthly newspaper, The Primary Source, planned to present Smith with a plaque at a brief ceremony Wednesday.

The newspaper was founded 15 months ago to offer "one unified conservative voice" for the 4,500 Tufts undergraduates, he said.

Kelley said the newspaper chose Smith for its first such award because he followed through on the Justice Department decision to prosecute registration resisters, attempted to "crush drug sales at the core" and opposed mandatory school busing.

Concerts fail to raise gas money

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Concerts over the Thanksgiving weekend by "Godfather of Soul" James Brown didn't even pay for gasoline needed to get the band back to Georgia.

A creaky bus with Brown's name on the side and 13 passengers aboard left the Woodlake Inn parking lot late Tuesday in search of a place to camp until money arrives. Henry Stallings, the band's manager, was believed to be in Los Angeles trying to come up with funds.

A member of the band, the "J-B's," said the concerts were organized too hastily and lacked promotion.

Brown came to Sacramento in the first place to answer charges of being in arrears on child support payments from a 1969 paternity suit. He booked the concerts and sent back to Augusta, Ga., for the band after Superior Court Judge Carol Miller sentenced him to 75 days in jail, suspended on condition that within 10 days he pay $10,500 in overdue child support to a Sacramento woman.

Film star speaks with sharp tongue

LONDON — Lillian Gish was one of the great stars of the silent screen, but on the subject of movies she speaks loudly — and with a sharp tongue.

"We've lost the human equation in movies today," Miss Gish said Tuesday at a luncheon promoting her appearance at the London Film Festival. "What we used to call love and affection have now become sex and lust. It's not very attractive, I think."

Miss Gish, 87 and in films since she was 12, speaks about today's movies with first-hand knowledge, since she continues to work.

Information booth officer enlightens visitors

By ANGIE WILSON
Collegian Reporter

When a visitor comes to K-State the first place he stops may be the information booth located in the Union parking lot.

"I'm busy all the time," said Ed Carney, security officer for the K-State Police Department and booth attendant.

Carney retired from the Riley County Police Department in February 1977 after 23 years of service. He spent 15 of those years working in communications and records.

"When I retired from the police department I was always into statistics...I'm still in statistics," he said.

The 4-by-6 booth is equipped with a heating and air conditioning system. It operates from 7 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday. During the football season, the booth stays open Saturdays. Carney operates the booth daily until 3 p.m. and then has students work the remaining two hours.

One purpose of the booth is to provide a place for visitors to get temporary parking permits.

"When the booth is closed, visitors obtain parking permits across the street at the police department," Carney said.

"This thing (the booth) opened Sept. 5, 1979," he said. Since then, it has served 112,951 people as recorded in September of this year, he said.

During the first month it was open, 974 people stopped by the information booth, Carney said. Last March, more than 5,000 people sought information there, he added.

The average number of visitors for the past four years is 117 people per day. Carney said the average is somewhat misleading because the booth is much busier now than when it first opened.

"In 1979 to 1980 the average was 56 people per day and it has kept increasing. For 1982 to 1983 the average is 160 people per day and an average of 72 parking permits (issued from the information booth) per day. You have to learn to write fast."

"I'm always busy doing something," he said.

Carney said 2,000 more people have visited the booth this year compared to last year at this time.

Information about visitors is recorded daily and Carney makes weekly, monthly and annual reports using these statistics.

One of the busiest times for the booth is when school begins in August but records don't show this because the last two weeks of the month reflect the increase, he said.

In addition to issuing 56,635 visitor parking permits in the past four years, the booth provides a place for visitors to get what the booth's name implies — information.

Carney said people most often ask about how to get to the Union and Anderson Hall. Delivery truck drivers go to the booth seeking information to find housing or educational buildings, he said.

"I can tell them what I know or I can tell them who to contact," he said.

No one can have all the answers all the time and Carney has found himself in this situation before.

"I may send someone to what I think is the building they're looking for. Someone comes back and says, 'You sent me to the wrong building.' I say, 'Now we both know it was the wrong building.'"

Fundamentalist rally supports Christian school

By The Associated Press

PLATTSBROUGH, Neb. — Nearly 100 fundamentalist ministers and laymen from around the country converged on this southeast Nebraska community of 6,300 Wednesday to rally in support of seven jailed fathers of pupils at a non-accredited Christian school.

The school in the basement of the Faith Baptist Church in nearby Louisville, closed since the fathers were jailed last week, was reopened by the visiting ministers Wednesday morning.

The demonstrators marched peacefully outside the Cass County Jail as they carried signs reading "Don't Ignore Our Constitution," "America — The Land of the Free" and "Don't Arrest Our Wives."

The last sign was a reference to arrest warrants outstanding for the wives of the seven jailed men. Cass County Attorney Ron Moravec confirmed that the warrants were issued last week, but he said sheriff's deputies were unable to find the women or eight other men for whom warrants were issued on contempt of court charges.

One of the men still at large was the Rev. Everett Sileven, who runs the Faith Christian School, which was closed by court order for failure to use state certified teachers as required by state education regulations.

The Rev. Greg Dixon of Indianapolis, one of the leaders of the protest against the jailings, said the ministers would "be here as long as it takes to resolve this situation."

Dixon said state officials were trying to make an obvious religious issue into an education issue. He described the situation as "very grave."

Leonard Zike of White Cloud, Mich., one of the ministers who was at the church earlier in the day, said fewer than 10 children attended classes.

"We're not the lawbreakers. They (the state) are," Zike said, adding that the state, in attempting to close the school, was violating the church's right to "public worship."

Cass County authorities had taken no action to prevent the opening of the school, Zike said.

Moravec refused to divulge the county's next step in the school case.

"We're being used as pawns on both sides by these people seeking press coverage, and I have no intention of telling those people what my next move is going to be," Moravec said.

Sileven has fought the state regulations for more than five years. His appeals to both the Nebraska and U.S. Supreme Courts have been turned down. The U.S. Supreme Court said that regulation of education was not a federal issue.

Sileven, who also was jailed last year on a contempt of court violation for failing to close the school, says that the school is part of the church's ministry, and cannot be regulated by the state.

Sileven currently is in hiding. Dixon said that several ministers "probably know where he is" but would not elaborate. "It would serve no purpose for Dr. Sileven to return to jail," Dixon said.

After visiting with the seven jailed men Wednesday, Dixon told their supporters outside the jail that "the men do not feel they are suffering. They have told me they would sit there as long as this thing takes."

Dixon said an unarmed security force has been organized to protect the Louisville church. Scattered incidents of vandalism have been reported against church property since the fathers of the students were jailed.

Gov. Bob Kerrey said Monday that the ministers didn't need any extra protection as they had requested.

Out-of-state ministers came to Louisville in October 1982 to protest the county's padlocking of the church. Nearly 100 of them had to be carried out of the church by deputies and state troopers when they refused a request from Cass County Sheriff Fred Tesch to leave.

Police rescue abducted Heineken millionaire

By The Associated Press

AMSTERDAM, Netherlands — Police rescued kidnapped millionaire brewer Alfred Heineken and his chauffeur in a pre-dawn raid on an isolated warehouse Wednesday, and arrested 24 suspects in three cities.

A ransom reported to be as high as $11.6 million was paid Monday, but police said at least part of it was recovered from the homes of suspects.

The 60-year-old chairman of the Heineken Brewery and his chauffeur Ab Doderer, 57, were found alone, manacled to a wall and clad only in pajamas in an unheated building in an industrial park near the harbor. They were cold but unharmed, officers said.

Police, who had kept watch on the park after receiving an anonymous tip two weeks ago, raided it when they had no word from the kidnapers for two days after the ransom was delivered.

At a news conference, police said the two victims had been imprisoned in separate cells hidden behind a false wall in the warehouse.

Police said the rescued men were given clean clothes and immediately taken to Heineken's heavily guarded villa in the seaside town of Noordwijk, about 20 miles from Amsterdam, for a reunion with their families.

Police refused to say how much ransom was involved, but Dutch newspapers have widely reported it amounted to the equivalent of $10 million to $11.6 million.

Reagan's Middle East policy draws Lebanese complaints

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Six months after the troop withdrawal agreement between Israel and Lebanon was signed, the Reagan administration's single foreign policy "success" in the Middle East this year has become an obstacle in attempts to end the bloodshed in Lebanon.

"We are at an impasse," said one senior Lebanese official last week. "We negotiated the agreement in good faith and with good intentions, (but) it cannot be implemented in its present form."

The May 17 agreement provides for an Israeli troop withdrawal from Lebanon if Syrian forces also leave. So far, they have not.

"It's a race between politics and total collapse," the Lebanese official said. "I'm beginning to panic, beginning to think we haven't even a month."

Lebanese President Amin Gemayel meets today with President Reagan in Washington, and it is expected that Gemayel will plead for modifications in the agreement.

Gemayel is hoping that the new U.S. chief Middle East negotiator, Donald Rumsfeld, has come up with some new ideas on his just completed swing around the region, and that Reagan can be persuaded that some accommodation with Syria is essential. But he's unlikely to get any encouragement.

Reagan and Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, who concluded a Washington visit on Tuesday, reaffirmed their support for the May 17 pact.

"The only basis for a settlement of the Lebanese problem is the full implementation of the May 17, 1983 agreement in all its parts," Shamir said before leaving Washington.

The pact has become a liability for Lebanon — a major problem in reconciliation talks among this country's warring factions and a blockade to even beginning talks with Syria on the eventual removal of 30,000 Syrian soldiers from north Lebanon and the eastern Bakaa Valley.

The agreement calls for Israel to withdraw its occupation army from the south in return for security and political concessions from Lebanon. Israel would get joint patrols in the south to guard against infiltration of Palestinian guerrillas there, limits on the size of the Lebanese army in the region, and a "liaison" office in Beirut.

In a separate, private agreement with the United States, however, Israel said it would not implement the withdrawal unless Syria agreed to pull out at the same time.

That is not happening. Syrian President Hafez Assad condemned the Lebanese-Israeli pact, claiming it threatens his country and makes Lebanon a virtual Israeli puppet.

Lebanese leftist and opposition groups rallied behind the Syrians. They and Assad are insisting that Israel withdraw without conditions and before the Syrians.

Israeli officials have warned they might further cut off the already isolated south from the rest of the country and settle in for a long stay if the pact is canceled. The United States, in turn, maintains it stands behind the pact as the best either side can get, and with advantages for both.

There are some small signs of change.

Caught between the fundamentalist Shiites, Christians and Palestinians in the south and taking casualties almost every day, Israel has already been forced to unilaterally withdraw from the central mountains to a line beginning at the port of Sidon. There are strong indications, as the attacks and ambushes continue, that Israel will withdraw another step to the south in the spring.

With political opposition to the occupation of southern Lebanon growing in Israel, many Lebanese and Americans believe it would be too costly for the Israelis to stay very long.

Syria, which refused to even talk about the pact or a possible withdrawal from Lebanon for six months, sent its foreign minister, Abdul-Halim Khaddam, to Beirut earlier in November. It still adamantly opposes the pact, but seems to be giving hints that some compromise might be reached.

But the threats of renewed violence are multiplying.

The mountain civil war that erupted in September still simmers, with shelling exchanges every day. The Lebanese army also has almost daily firefights with Shiite Moslem militiamen in the southern suburbs around Beirut. Radical pro-Iranian militia groups blamed for the bombings that killed 297 U.S. Marines and French soldiers have repeatedly and publicly declared their intention to continue such attacks.

Though growing rapidly by conscription and extensive American aid, the Lebanese army remains overstretched, with most of its top units committed to positions in the mountains.

Hawaiian volcano breaks silence

By The Associated Press

VOLCANO, Hawaii — Lava fountains spouted hundreds of feet into the air Wednesday morning as Kilauea Volcano ended a more than three-week break in its long-lived but sporadic 1983 eruption.

The eruption took place in the volcano's east rift zone, located several miles from any roads. A trip wire placed in an active vent in the zone was broken Tuesday afternoon, indicating the appearance of lava in the vent, said Ed Wolfe, a staff geologist at the U.S. Geological Survey's Hawaiian Volcano Observatory.

KSAC marks 60 years minus on-air revelry

By The Collegian Staff

Although no records remain of its early history, KSAC-AM begins its 60th anniversary celebration today. KSAC, K-State's extension radio station, carried a special five-hour nation-wide dedication program Dec. 1, 1924, Jack Burke, station manager, said. The station was housed since its inception on the first and second floors of Nichols Gymnasium, but when fire destroyed the building Dec. 13, 1968, the station's tapes and materials were lost, he said.

KSAC is now located in McCain Auditorium and broadcasts to parts of Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Oklahoma and Missouri between 12:30 and 5:30 p.m. Monday through Friday on 580 AM. No special broadcasts are planned for today because of the lack of historical material, Burke said.

The forerunner of KSAC, radio station 9YV, broadcast from Manhattan in 1912 as the first weather broadcasting station west of the Mississippi River. In 1921, the first words and music were broadcast from the K-State campus, Burke said.

Originally at 880 on the dial, the station switched to 580 in 1928 when it began sharing time with WIBW-AM in Topeka, an arrangement that still exists, Burke said.

KSAC began broadcasting in 1924 when Eric Lyon, Samuel Pickard and L.C. Williams, K-State physics professors, donated $50 each to lease a telephone line between Manhattan and Milford. As a result, K-State programs were broadcast on a station owned and operated in Milford by Kansas radio personality, "Doc" Brinkley.

These early broadcasts featured "College of the Air," from 7 to 8 p.m. each weekday. People throughout 39 states and Canada listened to lectures on crops, livestock, dairying, poultry, agricultural economics, food, clothing, interior design, and farm mechanics.

"Our style has changed since 1924," Burke said. KSAC offers programs such as "Music from the Masters," "Voices from Kansas," "Ideas Unlimited" and "Agriculture Today," he said.

The station focuses on news, Burke said, and also airs Landon Lectures and University convocations.

The station has tentative plans to broadcast various special programs throughout the year to celebrate the anniversary.

Bill allows legal guardian to cease life support system

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A legal guardian would have the same right to remove a ward of the state from life support systems that a parent or individual currently has under a proposal Wednesday endorsed by a legislative study committee.

The Special Care Services Committee voted to introduce a bill to the 1984 Kansas Legislature that would amend current state law and allow guardians to remove a terminally ill or injured state ward from life support systems under strict guidelines. Currently, it is impossible for a ward of the state to be taken off life-support systems when death is imminent.

"The way it is now, we have two classes of citizens: those who can decide for themselves they don't want their death to be prolonged by heroic life-saving measure and wards of the state who have absolutely no say in the matter," said Sen. Jan Meyers, R-Overland Park. "I think this is going to be very controversial but it's important. Right now it's impossible for a guardian to do anything for a ward."

Sen. Mike Johnston, D-Parsons, said the state wards should have the same rights as other Kansas citizens enjoy under the Kansas Natural Death Act. Under that act, a person can be removed from life-sustaining medical equipment if two doctors diagnose incurable disease, injury or a condition that will make death imminent. The individual must have consented in writing to removal from the machines prior to the action.

"This just gives state wards and guardians the same rights other people have," Johnston said. "It's patterned after the federal death act and really pretty important."

A guardian would be required to get a court order to remove a ward from life-support systems and the order would only be granted after a full hearing at which the ward is represented by legal counsel and two doctors testify as to the patients' condition. They must convince the court that life-support systems are artificially prolonging the dying process.

The committee also agreed to ask the Legislative Post Audit Committee to order audits of nursing home issues which surfaced during legislative hearings. The committee wants audits of administrative costs, property costs, room and board fees and general health care costs associated with adult care homes. The information would be given to the Public Health and Welfare Committee of the 1984 Legislature.

FBI releases profile of killer in slaying of editor, family

By The Associated Press

FORT WAYNE, Ind. — Newspaperman Dan Osborne and his family most likely were the victims of a random attack by a young man who lives or works within walking distance of their home, according to an FBI psychological profile of the killer released Wednesday by police.

Police Chief David Riemen said police have no suspects matching the profile from the Behavioral Science Unit of the FBI Academy at Quantico, Va.

The FBI makes observations about killings and the killer based on the statistical probability of similar crimes.

Profiles are put together based on photographs of the crime scene and autopsy reports.

Fort Wayne police requested the profile in early October after the slayings of Dan Osborne, 35; his wife, Jane, 34; and their son, Ben, 11. They were found bludgeoned to death in their home Sept. 19.

Only the couple's daughter, Caroline, 2, survived.

Osborne was editorial page editor of the Fort Wayne News-Sentinel and had worked on newspapers in Pittsburg, Kan.; Little Rock, Ark.; Tulsa, Okla.; and Kansas City, Mo.

The FBI report said the killer appeared to have no specific motive for the murders but felt a great deal of rage toward Jane Osborne.

The FBI described the killer as most likely being an introverted white male of average height, between the ages of 21 and 27 who lives or works within an easy walk of the Osborne home.

VERY SIMPLY, OLIVETTI'S ET225 ELECTRONIC TYPEWRITER IS THE BEST VALUE ON THE MARKET.

We've all heard a lot of breathless claims from IBM and Xerox about the memory and printing capabilities of their electronic typewriters. Frankly, we're not impressed.

Because capabilities like these end where today's office requirements begin.

The Olivetti ET225, by comparison, is designed for where office automation is going in the future. In fact, it's the only electronic typewriter that fully expands its capabilities as your needs expand.

All the way up to sophisticated word processing. The basic ET225 provides features to take repetitive tasks out of typing, automatic paper feed, a clock and date keeper, Automatic underlining and centering. A wider paper carriage than our competitors offer (plus a 500 character memory and display windows that help keep mistakes from reaching the page).

Then add the 604 art to it.

Be connected to the ET225, you can copy, and you have all the word processing functions most companies need at a price they all can afford.

With all this, can we blame IBM and Xerox for only comparing their typewriters with one another and not with our ET225? Because when you get right down to it, there really is no comparison.

Want To Sell Your Books ?

Question: How does the Union Bookstore determine how much your books are worth when you sell them back?

Answer: If the Bookstore has notification from the instructor that the books are to be re-adopted for use the next semester, and if the Bookstore does not already have a sufficient stock on hand, then you will be offered 60% of the publisher's current list price.

For example: If a book sells for $10 new and it meets the requirements noted above, the book would be bought from you for $6.

If the Bookstore has not received notice that the book will be used again, or if it already has a sufficient stock on hand, the book would be worth the current wholesale price as indicated by one of the nation's largest jobbers of used textbooks.

If you have any questions about the price being paid for a textbook, the buyer will be happy to answer any questions which you may have regarding the price paid.

Question: Is 60% the usual price paid for textbooks around the country?

Answer: Definitely not. Most stores in the United States pay only 50% for books being used again. The Union Bookstore is one of the few stores which pays 60%. And remember, we pay cash. You don't have to take your money out in trade.

Question: What about paperbacks? Does the 60% policy apply to them too?

Answer: Yes. The Union Bookstore does not penalize you on paperbacks. If they are being used again, and if the bookstore needs them, you will receive 60% of the publisher's list price.

Question: If the publisher's price has gone up since I bought my books, will I receive the benefit of that price increase?

Answer: Yes. For instance, if you bought your book for $9 and the publisher's list price is now $10, you will get $6, not $5.40.

KCC tentatively rules out long distance access charge

By The Associated Press

Also during Wednesday's deliberations, the three commissioners tentatively agreed to implement a new procedure of reviewing Southwestern Bell's proposed construction projects costing more than $500,000.

Commissioners contended that the review would allow the regulatory agency to exert some control over Bell's expenditures for replacement of equipment and buildings. Still, the KCC staff said it was unlikely that the commission could veto a construction project proposed by Southwestern Bell.

In addition, the commission tentatively agreed that Bell should not be allowed to charge ratepayers for about $3.5 million in discounted telephone service, including both long distance and local service and equipment, for its employees and some retired workers.

The commission, during deliberations, considers recommendations by its staff for reducing Bell's proposed operating expenses of more than $400,000 or adjusting the company's projected income. Many of the changes involve accounting methods for such issues as taxes and depreciation of equipment.

Southwestern Bell contends it needs higher rates to generate an additional $204 million annually to cover its projected expenditures after the AT&T divestiture. The KCC, by reducing Bell's expenditures, lessens the company's need for additional revenue and higher rates.

For instance, the commission tentatively agreed to cut about $13.6 million in proposed construction projects. In addition, the KCC imposed a 3 percent inflation factor on the company's projected growth in total operating expenditures in the coming year. Although the exact effect of that limit has not been determined by the KCC, Lennen said it would mean considerable cutbacks within the company.

If Southwestern Bell's full rate request was approved, the cost of basic local service would nearly double. It would add $7 a month to bills of residential customers and $1.30 a month to bills of business customers.

The KCC staff has recommended an increase between $83 million and $104 million, and the commissioners accepted most of its staff's suggestions on Wednesday.

If the staff's $82.7 million recommendation were approved, there would be no increase in basic monthly charges for residential or business service. Staff's $103.8 million recommendation would mean a 65-cent increase in monthly rates for residential customers and $1.30 a month increase for business customers.

Southwestern Bell is the largest public utility in Kansas. It serves about 785,000 customers in 177 communities, including Wichita, Topeka, Kansas City, Hutchinson, Manhattan, Salina, Lawrence, Emporia, Hays, Dodge City, Garden City, Goodland, Parsons and Pittsburg.

TOPEKA — The Kansas Corporation Commission tentatively agreed Wednesday that residential and business customers of Southwestern Bell Telephone Co. will not pay a monthly access charge to tie into long distance networks within the state.

The three commissioners reached the decision during the first day of deliberations on Southwestern Bell's proposed $204.5 million rate increase. The KCC, which regulates utilities in Kansas, plans to conclude its work on the case late today and will determine then how much rates will go up.

The rejection of an access charge on consumers or "end users" was perhaps the most significant decision made by the KCC as it began to trim the company's rate request during the day-long deliberations.

Southwestern Bell had proposed to raise $28.6 million by levying a $2 monthly fee on residential customers and $6 monthly fee on business customers in 1984 for "access" to long distance networks, which is necessary for people to make long distance calls to places outside of their areas code in Kansas. The access fees would have been in addition to monthly charges for basic local telephone service.

The commissioners agreed that it was unfair to charge all customers for a service they might not use.

"There are some people who have telephones that don't use the long distance network and ought not to have to pay to have access to it," said KCC Chairman Michael Lennen.

The access charge issue arose because of the impending breakup of Southwestern Bell's parent company, American Telephone and Telegraph Co.

The AT&T divestiture, which is to take effect Jan. 1, means that Southwestern Bell must operate as a separate company. Revenues from telephone equipment now in customer homes and businesses and most long distance services will be transferred to AT&T under the divestiture.

In Kansas, for example, Southwestern Bell will be able to complete customer long distance calls primarily within the 316 and 913 area code boundaries, but not between them. All other long distance calls will be handled by other companies, such as AT&T or MCI, which are called interexchange carriers.

The commission, when it meets to conclude deliberations on the Bell case, will decide the access charges to be paid by interexchange carriers to provide long distance service within Kansas.

The Federal Communications Commission has authorized the collection of access charges both on customers and on interexchange carriers as a way to pay local telephone companies for the costs of providing lines and equipment which enable people to make and receive long distance calls.

For interstate long distance access, the FCC had mandated a $2 a month fee on residential and $6 fee on business customers. Those were scheduled to go into effect Jan. 1, but have been delayed at least until April. Moreover, Congress considered legislation before its adjournment which would have blocked the charges.

Depending upon congressional and FCC actions, it is still possible that the federal government will authorize access charges on Kansas and all other telephone customers for the right to tap into interstate long distance networks.

New test to aid in breast cancer detection

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Doctors can predict how long breast cancer victims will remain free of the disease after surgery by measuring the sensitivity of their tumors to sex hormones, a new study says.

The test, used in women whose cancer has spread to their lymph nodes, identifies tumors that require the sex hormones to grow. This kind of cancer develops more slowly and is easier to treat than other forms of breast cancer.

"It's enormously powerful as a predictor of recurrence," said Dr. William L. McGuire, one of the researchers.

In their study, the doctors measured the number of sex hormone receptors on cancer cells removed from patients. These receptors are like chemical magnets that attract the hormones estrogen and progesterone.

The presence of receptors means that the sex hormones promote the growth of the tumors. These patients will often be helped by a drug called tamoxifen, which plugs the receptors so sex hormones cannot become attached to them.

"If the receptors are absent, this means that they have a much more aggressive tumor that will recur more quickly," McGuire said.

"From a statistical point of view, it appears as if the measurement of these receptors ought to be mandatory in all patients," said Dr. Gary M. Clark, who directed the study.

"It not only tells us which patients are likely to recur," McGuire said, "but it also tells us which type of therapy to use."

The test results mean that patients whose cancer requires sex hormones can be spared unnecessary treatment.

Breast cancer kills about 37,000 people in the United States each year, and is the leading kind of cancer death in women. The survival rate is much higher if the disease has not spread to the lymph nodes or beyond before treatment.

The research, conducted at the University of Texas Health Science Center at San Antonio, was published in last Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine.

The doctors based their findings on an analysis of tissue samples from 189 cancer patients who had undergone mastectomies. The cancer in all of them had spread to their lymph nodes.

In those whose cancer cells had many progesterone receptors, 80 percent were still free of cancer five years later, compared with 30 percent of those whose tumors had few or none of these receptors.

Emporia woman charged in local killing

By The Associated Press

JUNCTION CITY — An Emporia woman accused of arranging to hire someone to shoot her husband earlier this month has been charged with conspiracy to commit first-degree murder.

A Dec. 20 preliminary hearing was set for Lorna Anderson, 34. She was charged late Tuesday afternoon after appearing earlier that day in Geary County District Court, a spokesman for the prosecutor's office said. Anderson remained free after posting $50,000 in bond.

She was arrested on the conspiracy charge Nov. 23 in Topeka at the home of a relative, then was released after posting the $50,000 bond sum.

Daniel Carter, Anderson's former hairdresser and now an employee at the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant near Burlington, was arrested Nov. 18 and charged with conspiracy to commit first-degree murder. He remained free on $50,000 bond and faced a Dec. 7 preliminary hearing.

Authorities accused Anderson of paying Carter $5,000 to hire someone to shoot her husband, Martin Anderson, 34.

He was shot to death Nov. 4 along Kansas 177 about 15 miles south of Manhattan. His wife told authorities they stopped along the highway because she was ill. A man then shot her husband and took his wallet, she said.

'Rockers' reggae shows spirit of black rebellion in Jamaica

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Seldom has the music of a society become so intrinsically integrated into its political ideology as has reggae. Reggae has become virtually synonymous with Rastafarianism, a counterculture faith of Jamaican blacks that espouses non-violence while awaiting the demise of the white establishment.

In "Rockers," the lives of the musicians are depicted as they continue their passive struggle for autonomy. The music becomes a very important ingredient of the story and not just an added frill to the film's plot. The music is a way of life that is governed by the Rasta philosophy.

The recording and distribution of reggae music is a thriving business in Jamaica that has been discouraged by the government. The production of the music is a form of rebellion where the enthusiasm for an art is transferred into a political movement.

The focus of "Rockers" is less upon the Rasta culture than it is upon the effect of the music. This may be disappointing to some people because little insight into Rasta is given, but the relationship between Rasta and reggae is clearly defined.

The film's central character is Horsemouth (Leroy Wallace) who is considered both in the film and in real life as the best reggae drummer in Jamaica. In the film, Horsemouth is artistically successful, but still lives in virtual poverty.

In order to become a record distributor Horsemouth purchases a motorbike. When the bike is stolen by the rich whites who control business, Horsemouth rallies his friends together and they steal back the bike, as well as all of the other belongings in the mobster's home. They then distribute the goods, Robin Hood style, to the people living in the Kingston ghetto.

The plot is rather simplistic and unconvincing, but to focus upon the flaws of the plot would be unfair to the film. "Rockers" is successful because the spirit and importance of the music is made clear. The film's ending may be somewhat escapist in nature, but at the same time it is very uplifting — like the music that forms the basis for the film.

Many of the roles in the film are played by actual members of the Jamaican musical community. Horsemouth buys a motorbike from Gregory Isaacs. The Mighty Diamonds operate a machine shop. Robbie Shakespeare runs a garage. Producer Jack Ruby plays himself and the late Jacob Miller plays the lead singer of the band to which Horsemouth belongs.

Each man plays a character based very much upon his own personality. The interaction between the men and their use of the Rasta language is captured with a naturalness that would have eluded professional actors. As a result, few of the performers are up to developing their characters. Wisely, though, director Theodoros Bafaloukos doesn't allow any of the performers except for Horsemouth to stay on camera for a very long period.

Many of the reggae artists only give short cameo performances — like Burning Spear's riveting a cappella performance of "Jah No Dead." Other songs featured in the film include Inner Circle's "We Are Rockers" and Peter Tosh's "Stepping Razor."

At times, the song choices are a little too obvious — like the Maytones' "Money Worries" playing while Horsemouth is trying to sell records at the record stores, or Junior Marvin's "Police and Thieves" playing while the police raid a party and Horsemouth's motorbike is stolen. The effect of the music is so exhilarating, though, that many of the film's flaws are eagerly overlooked.

Efforts to save newspaper may prove futile

By The Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — There has been little progress in efforts to save the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, which is scheduled to go out of business Dec. 31 if a buyer cannot be found, according to officials of the Herald Co.

Four potential buyers have been asked to provide "some evidence of their financial ability to support a newspaper," but so far, none had done so, said William E. Willis of New York, a lawyer for the Herald Co., which owns the financially ailing newspaper.

"We really can't negotiate seriously with someone without this necessary background data," Willis said Tuesday. "Each day that goes by makes the situation look a bit gloomier to me."

Willis said the Herald Co., which is owned by the family of S.I.

Newhouse Jr., had received "no nibbles, not a one," from any newspaper chain. Nor, he said, has the company heard from Rupert Murdoch, an Australian who operates a worldwide publishing company that recently bought the Chicago Sun-Times.

"All of the offers have come from people with no experience in publishing a major metropolitan daily newspaper," Willis said.

Meanwhile, officials of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch announced Tuesday night that it will become a morning newspaper immediately after the Globe-Democrat's closing.

Nicholas Penniman IV, assistant general manager of the Pulitzer Co., which owns the Post-Dispatch, gave notification of the proposed change to representatives of 11 unions at the paper.

Penniman said the Post-Dispatch will abandon its afternoon editions because of the costs, circulation and other reasons. He said the Post-Dispatch expects to boost its circulation by about 125,000, bringing it to 375,000 daily.

Nicaraguan leader expects attack by U.S.

By The Associated Press

MANAGUA, Nicaragua — Foreign Minister Miguel d'Escoto said Wednesday the threat of a U.S. invasion "remains very real."

He said that as a result Nicaragua "will not let down its defense nor the disposition to fight of its people, who definitely will be the ones to prevent the diabolic plans of the United States from materializing." D'Escoto spoke to the Council of State, the law-making body of the leftist Sandinista government.

In Washington, Reagan administration sources said U.S. special envoy Richard Stone would meet Thursday in Panama with leaders of Nicaraguan rebel groups battling the leftist Sandinista government here. The sources said Stone would try to get the groups, at least some of which receive covert U.S. aid, to end their differences and improve their disposition to fight.

Honduran President Roberto Suazo Cordova sent a letter to junta coordinator Daniel Ortega saying, "I consider unjustified your apprehensions about possible aggression on the part of Honduras."

The text of the letter was released in Tegucigalpa, the Honduran capital. It was a response to Ortega's letter expressing concern about plans to reactivate the Central American Defense Council.

D'Escoto also said Nicaragua would present three new points for discussion at a technical session of the Contadora Group starting Thursday in Panama.

Air Force cadets die in blizzard during effort to return for sign-in

By The Associated Press

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. — Hours before an Air Force Academy football player and his cadet girlfriend died in a blizzard-bound pickup truck, the young man's mother had urged them to seek shelter and not to dodge roadblocks on a snowbound interstate highway.

"We told them, 'If you're stuck in Colby, just make the best of it,'" said Betty Bullard of her last conversation with her son, Cadet 3rd Class Brian Bullard.

"We told them not to try to go around the roadblocks. But I'm afraid they just had a case of, 'We've got a four-wheel drive, and we can get through,'" she said.

Bullard and his girlfriend, Cadet 3rd Class Diane L. Williams of Cameron, Mo., on Sunday apparently gambled they could beat the blizzard and slipped by roadblocks on Interstate 70 in Kansas.

A snow plow driver found their bodies Monday morning in the pickup under an I-70 overpass four miles east of Goodland. In the cab were scraps of paper on which they had chronicled their final hours before succumbing to carbon monoxide fumes.

"Smelling something" and "clearing the exhaust" were among the log's entries, which noted that their pickup became stuck about 9 p.m. Sunday. Strong winds continued to whip the blinding snow during the night and dropped the wind chill factor to 30 degrees below zero.

The final entry was timed at 3:20 a.m., and a coroner ruled that the cadets died less than half an hour later.

"They sensed something was wrong," Sheriff Jack Armstrong of Sherman County, said Tuesday. "There was six feet of snow around the pickup. You could see where he had tried to clear away the snow."

Williams was a member of the academy women's golf team. The cadets, both 19, had spent Thanksgiving at the home of her grandparents in New Cambria, near Salina.

Williams' father, Air Force Reserve Col. Ronald K. Williams, said Wednesday they left Saturday night and had a deadline of 7:30 p.m. Sunday to sign in at the academy.

The National Weather Service said blizzard warnings had been issued early Saturday for northwest Kansas and the storm was raging through the area by midnight.

"My daughter called Sunday from Colby," Williams said. "They couldn't find a room...I told them to call their commanding officer and let him know where they were. I don't know if they ever did call."

Airman 1st Class Scott Wise, a spokesman for the Air Force Academy, said Wednesday the couple did call Sunday to say they would be late.

"They called in and were instructed to return as soon as possible but to exercise caution," Wise said.

Mrs. Carl Bice of Beloit, said her son, Greg, also a cadet at the Air Force Academy, called and asked for an extension of the sign-in time because of the winter storm.

"They are told there is no excuse for not making it back in time — none...I know the two who died were trying to get back in time," Mrs. Bice said.

However, Capt. Randy Moore of the Air Force Academy said cadets "know they are in no trouble if they are delayed by the weather. Many didn't make it back on time this weekend. They are told if they have any problems simply call and notify us."

Armstrong said the log was among Bullard's personal effects and was returned with the body to Colorado Springs. The sheriff said the log contained some thoughts he believed were personal and should be revealed only by the family.

Freshman defensive linemen Les Miller was named Big Eight Defensive Newcomer of the Year by The Associated Press.

Two 'Cat defenders nab Big Eight honors

From Staff and Wire Reports

K-State's defensive lineman Les Miller was named by the Associated Press as the Big Eight Conference defensive Newcomer of the Year while the Wildcats' do-everything Reggie Singletary made the conference's first-team defense for the third consecutive year.

Miller, a 6-foot-8, 255-pound freshman, led the team in blocked passes with five, including three in the last game of the season against the University of Colorado. He also had 26 tackles for the season.

The 6-2, 264-pound Singletary received first-team votes at down lineman, linebacker and defensive end since at one time or another his career he has played all three. He was named as a down lineman for 1983.

In related news, the AP released its all-Big Eight team with Turner Gill, Mike Rozier and Irving Fryar, the heart of a Nebraska offense which many consider the most powerful in college history, heading up the 1983 team.

With Gill pulling the trigger and Rozier and Fryar supplying most of the pop, Nebraska's offense swamped one opponent after another while winning 12 games and losing none. The 'Huskers' have averaged more than 550 yards and 50 points a game. In addition, their winning margin has averaged 39.2 points a game with the first team rarely playing in the fourth quarter.

Rozier, also a third-time first-teamer, recorded the conference highest total rushing yards in a season — 2,148 — after he rambled for 205 yards in leading the 'Huskers' to their third consecutive Big Eight championship with a 28-21 defeat of Oklahoma last Saturday.

Perhaps Gill's most impressive statistic is Nebraska's record in games he has started — 29-1. Fryar, lined up at wingback, has averaged more than 100 yards in all-purpose running while scoring 10 touchdowns.

Two senior blockers for Nebraska's trio of backfield stars also were named to the first team. Guard Dean Steinkuhler, 6-foot-3, 270 pounds and described by Coach Tom Osborne as the equal of Outland Trophy winner Dave Rimington, was a unanimous pick as one down lineman. A near-unanimous choice was Scott Raridon, 6-3, 280.

At the other first-team running back is Oklahoma State junior Shawn Jones, who stepped in for the injured Ernest Anderson, last year's NCAA rushing champion, and gained 924 yards and scored seven touchdowns.

Iowa State sophomore Tracy Henderson, who led the league with eight touchdown receptions while catching 81 passes for 1,051 yards, was named to the other wide receiver slot. Henderson also set a Big Eight single-game record with 16 receptions against K-State this year. He barely nosed out Kansas senior Bob Johnson, who had a big game in the season finale to push his season total to 58 catches for 1,154 yards and seven touchdowns.

The tight end is Dave Hestera, a Colorado senior. At center, the voters' choice was Oklahoma junior Chuck Thomas, 6-3, 270. Missouri senior Conrad Goode, 6-6, 265, and Oklahoma State senior Kevin Igo, 6-0, 257, are the other down linemen.

The place-kicker by unanimous choice was Kansas senior Bruce Kallmeyer. Kallmeyer's 98 points this year are a conference record for a kicker and his 233 total points are the career standard.

The defense is anchored by five repeaters — K-State's Singletary, Colorado defensive back Victor Scott and lineman Rick Bryan, end Kevin Murphy and linebacker Jackie Shipp of Oklahoma.

Leslie O'Neal, the Oklahoma State sophomore who helped mould the Cowboy defense into one of the steadiest units in the nation, was named at the third down lineman spot.

Joining Murphy at defensive end is Missouri senior Bobby Bell. Flanking Shipp at linebacker are Jay Wilson, who set a Missouri record for number of tackles, and Nebraska's Mike "Fort Knox" Knox.

It's a heavily senior-laden team, with only five juniors and two sophomores among the top 24 vote-getters.

NCAA spans KU with football probation

By The Associated Press

MISSION — The NCAA ended a 19-month investigation of the University of Kansas by handing the Jayhawks a two-year football probation Wednesday, which includes only one year of sanctions.

The National Collegiate Athletic Association said in a release that Kansas will not be eligible for a postseason football appearance following the 1984 football season and that the Jayhawks may not appear on television that year.

The NCAA noted none of the athletic department staff members involved in what it called "significant violations" remained at the university. However, it said a former assistant football coach — who was not named — must remain separated "from any involvement in the university's intercollegiate athletics program for a period of three years beginning Nov. 21, 1983."

Violations cited in the release included offering large amounts of money and other benefits to prospective players; providing prospects with expense-paid visits to the campus; providing employment to athletes and filing false statements that Kansas was in compliance with NCAA rules.

"In considering this case, the committee's primary concern was the recruiting approach utilized by certain former members of the university's coaching staff," Frank J. Remington, chairman of the NCAA Infractions Committee, said in a news release.

Coaching abilities to play major role in title hunt

No doubt about it. The Big Eight is the coaches' conference. From Missouri's Norm Stewart, to Oklahoma's Billy Tubbs and to K-State's Jack Hartman — they're among the nation's best. And the addition of Larry Brown at the head post at the University of Kansas does nothing to tarnish this image.

This year the conference's basketball coaches are going to be put to the test. Graduation has depleted the talent of several teams and they will be looking for immediate help from incoming players. The title will be up for grabs, and at least four teams have a legitimate chance snatching it. Because of the league's balance, the winner could lose as many as four conference battles.

The early nod here goes to Oklahoma. Sure they lost four starters, but they once again have freshman sensation — no, Marcus Dupree didn't return — All-American Wayman Tisdale. Already this season "The Way," as he is called by Sooners fans, has scored 80 points in three games as he led "Wayman University," as he is called by his coach, to third place in the Great Alaska Shootout in Anchorage.

Oklahoma will be a high-scoring team and will be boosted by one of the nation's top freshman classes. Freshman guard Tim McAlister scored 31 points in OU's final tournament game and joined Tisdale on the all-tournament team.

The Nebraska roundballers' methodical offense will be hard-pressed to match the point totals of the 'Husker football team, but they should challenge for the league title.

The key man is 6-foot-11 Dave Hoppen, who led last year's 'Husker squad in scoring while also leading them to a berth in the National Invitational Tournament's "Final Four". Stan Cloudy, the team's assists leader who scored in double figures, also returns.

Now comes nearly everyone else's preseason favorite — Kansas.

By the time KU players become accustomed to Brown and by the time Brown gets used to the Big Eight style of basketball, it'll be too late. And anyone expecting big things out of 7-1 Wichita State transfer Greg Dreiling, who brought much snickering at his thoughts of turning pro, is in for a big letdown. He's still a year away from being anything but tall.

KU's top two players are guard Carl Henry and forward Kelly Knight. Both will be among the league's best, but the lack of a talented point guard will keep KU from the top.

Iowa State will be a sleeper and could jump all the way to the top with a few breaks. ISU has 12 lettermen, including four starters, returning.

The Cyclones' top returnee is forward Barry Stevens, who led the team in scoring and canned the last-second shot — the final two of his 40 points — in overtime that upset Missouri, the eventual conference champions, last year.

If K-State can play consistently, it should finish at the top of the second division. A vital need is for someone — probably from one or both of the junior college transfers, Eric Watson and Tom Alfaro — to provide some scoring punch.

Jim Roder will provide consistency at the point-guard position, and the ever-hustling Tyrone Jackson should be a force off the bench.

Missouri's string of four consecutive conference titles will likely come to an end this year as the two players most responsible for the Tigers' success those years — 6-11 center Steve Stipanovich and sharpshooting Jon Sundvold — have entered the pro ranks.

Missouri should battle with Colorado, which returns a gem of a guard in Jay Humphries, for the sixth spot while graduation-ravaged Oklahoma State, which along with Missouri was an NCAA tourney participant, will be cellar-dwellers.

In all probability, no Big Eight team will finish among the nation's top twenty college teams. A pair of games that will help gauge Big Eight talent with the rest of the country are when Oklahoma and Tisdale meet No. 5-ranked Memphis State and its 6-10 All-American forward, Keith Lee, and when Kansas battles 7-1 preseason All-American center Sam Bowie and his bunch from No. 1-rated Kentucky.

Man your chalkboards, coaches. It should be quite a year.

Disabled learn self-defense techniques

By The Associated Press
PHILADELPHIA — They come in wheelchairs, on crutches or canes, and they learn as best they can various moves and techniques that may enable them to defend themselves in the streets or within their own homes, should the occasion arise.
"The disabled, like everybody else, are susceptible to the rigors of daily life — they, too, fall victim to muggers and other criminals," says Duncan Wyeth, Consumer Activities Director for United Cerebral Palsy. "And because they're disabled, they are too often easy prey."
Once a week, usually on Saturday afternoon, approximately a dozen group members meet at the United Cerebral Palsy Association of Philadelphia and Vicinity, properly attired in their gi (pronounced "ghee"), the belted pajama-like garment that is the universal uniform of karate, for a 2½-hour workout in self-defense.
This is a relatively new program, established by Norm Constantine,

Group uses modified karate

25, a black belt in karate, former recreation therapist at UCP and regional administrator of Martial Arts for the Handicapped. Constantine was the victim of a hit-and-run accident and remains in a semi-comatose state, but in his absence, volunteers trained by Constantine keep the program running.
What Constantine has been teaching is karate with modifications. A move normally made by someone in an erect position is adapted to the sitting position when necessary. If a person has limited use of a leg, an extra movement with the arm is used. The teaching is modified to fit the individual.
"In some ways, the handicapped have an advantage," Wyeth says. "With crutches, your reach is probably increased by three or four feet, and because you use crutches every day, your crutches become part of your body. So does a wheelchair.

"If a mugger grabs your crotch, use him for support and hit him with the other crutch," Wyeth advises. "Being in a wheelchair can force the criminal to come down to your level. Kick the attacker and roll your chair away from him or grab the criminal with either your legs or arms and trap him in your wheelchair, punching him about the face."
"But don't overlook the obvious — scream for help — your voice is one of the best defenses you have," adds Wyeth. "Learn to use what you have, even if it's part of your body that doesn't function 100 percent."
Practicing, the students take advantage of every bit of leverage that crutches and wheelchairs and wobbly legs and constricted hands can provide to wrestle their "attacker" to the ground, all the while yelling for help.
"Constantine was a demanding teacher, but we wouldn't want it any other way," said pupil Dewan Jones of Germantown. "Norm had to be tough with us, but we love him for helping us feel better about ourselves — you know, self-esteem."

According to Wyeth, "The self-confidence which these sessions build cannot be stressed enough. Many of the UCP clients come into the program with a poor self-image, but mastering some of the martial arts skills and techniques gives them greater confidence in themselves and their abilities which carries over into other aspects of their daily living."
The funds for this type of program and other such activities are obtained from proceeds of the United Cerebral Palsy "Weekend With The Stars" National Telethon, which airs January 14-15, 1984, over 100 stations coast-to-coast.
Cerebral palsy is the most widespread lifetime disability in the nation and affects 700,000 Americans today and 10,000 newborn infants each year, according to UCP officials.

Soviet political scene quiet without Andropov

By The Associated Press
MOSCOW — The usual autumn government and party meetings have not been scheduled yet this year — evidently because President Yuri V. Andropov is too ill to officiate. The strangely quiet political scene has led to speculation about who is running the Soviet Union.
Soviet sources have indicated in past weeks that the country is on a kind of automatic pilot.
Western diplomats, asking to remain anonymous, say they think day-to-day foreign policy decisions have been taken over by the military, led by Marshal Dmitri F. Ustinov.
The 69-year-old Andropov, his health a question mark since last spring, has not been seen in public since Aug. 18.
With so many uncertainties, the focus of attention now is on the failure of authorities here to announce a meeting of the rubber stamp national parliament, the Supreme Soviet.
This is a country where things tend to happen according to plan and tradition, and the Parliament session and meeting of the Communist Party Central Committee are always scheduled by mid-November.

The Soviet constitution says the legislature must meet twice a year. So far this year it has met only once, in June, when Andropov was named president, consolidating his absolute hold on power.
Tradition holds that its meetings are announced 30 days in advance, and Associated Press records dating back two decades show that every session has been preceded by a 30-day notice.
Those records also show that since 1962 no regular parliamentary session has ever been held later than Dec. 18. That was in 1974. Last year the Parliament met on Dec. 22, but that was a special occasion to mark the 60th anniversary of the founding of the Soviet Union.
Soviets insist that a meeting of the Parliament will come in the second half of December. The country still has no formally adopted economic plan or budget for the coming year and those documents are the business of the Parliament.

Andropov should attend the parliamentary session as head of state. He reportedly is suffering from a heart and kidney condition and the latest rumors in Moscow say he has lost the ability to walk. Nothing, however, is known for certain about the state of his health.
Tradition holds that the parliamentary sessions are preceded by a plenary session of the party Central Committee.
At those sessions the ruling Politburo makes top personnel changes and dictates the course of foreign and domestic policy.
Western diplomats say Andropov must be present at the plenum in his role as leader of the Communist Party.
Unofficial records show An-dropov's predecessor, Leonid I. Brezhnev, was never absent from public view for such a long period despite serious questions about his health dating from the mid-1970s.

Andropov failed Nov. 5 to attend the Kremlin meeting marking the Bolshevik Revolution, or the Nov. 7 military parade to celebrate the event. Brezhnev, despite poor health, was at last year's parade and stood two hours in freezing weather three days before he died of a heart attack.

BEEF—An Important Food

Beef is basic to the MEAT GROUP and a prime source of many essential nutrients (2 or more servings per day from this group are recommended). Beef is both high in quality and quantity of protein containing all the essential amino acids necessary to build, maintain and repair body tissues, and strengthen the defense mechanism against infection and disease. B vitamins help make better use of other nutrients in the food, are essential for good vision and clear eyes, appetite, healthy skin and nervous system.

Minerals are another food component, very much a part of body cells and fluids. Red blood cells can neither form nor function without iron. Beef is a major source of: iron; zinc; B-vitamins—niacin, thiamin, riboflavin, B-6, B-12; and other nutrients. Although a 3-ounce beef serving is adequate for nondieters, a 4-ounce beef serving supplies dieters with important vitamins, minerals, 34 grams of protein, and 18 grams of fat—for 304 Calories. For dieters who find it hard to get all needed nutrients while eating less food, this increased protein affords feelings of satisfaction, well-being, with less fatigue.

Beef, one of the best utilized and most digestible foods, provides outstanding nutritive values, whatever cut you choose to serve your family.

Center teaches self-sufficiency to disabled

By CATHY KARLIN
Features Editor

(This is the third of a three-part series about the programs and services offered to the developmentally disabled by Big Lakes Developmental Center.)

Self-sufficiency.

It's not a long word, nor a complex one, but to attain what it represents is a long, tough climb for some people.

At Big Lakes Developmental Center, developmentally disabled people are given a chance to be self-sufficient. The center owns three houses and rents two apartments where some clients can live under limited supervision. For usually the first time in their lives, these people can live in a situation comparable to adults of the normal population — away from their families and institutions.

Bertha Wilkinson has lived in the house at 415 Leavenworth St. for about a year. Formerly a resident of Norton State Hospital, she is one of several clients accepted at Big Lakes as the result of interviews conducted by Big Lakes staff at various state institutions.

Wilkinson said she prefers living here because at Norton she was not allowed to go anywhere by herself. "Here you can go out. I go to Safeway and the gas station. I go to dances, to church, sometimes I go to movies and all that. I mow and I sand. Around here I cook," she said.

"I play volleyball and I'm good at that," she added, smiling.

Wilkinson is only one of 24 clients in the residential program offered at Big Lakes. The program includes group living, in houses which are supervised by staff 24 hours a day and independent living, in which staff supervise residents about 20 hours a week and are on-call 24 hours a day.

To give the regular staff of the group houses a break, there are additional staff members who work only on weekends. Four out of the six weekend staff members are K-State students, and the other two are recent graduates, said Steve Moore, graduate student in horticulture therapy and Big Lakes residential manager.

"Moving into a house is a basic function of need," Moore said. "During the course of normalization people do move out and leave home. There is always a long waiting list for the houses. They're not big enough to handle the needs of all who want to live in them."

Besides giving clients supervision, the house program teaches clients basic skills such as cooking, cleaning, understanding money, self-help and mental help. Goals — such as learning to dial a telephone — are set for each client. Those adults who master these skills may then move into the apartment situation.

Sue Bullock, junior in elementary education, has worked with the Big Lakes residential program for the past 2½ years. She now works as an apartment supervisor for two women clients.

"Both my clients have been in houses under 24-hour supervision under a program that's difficult to get through. By the time they reach me they are to be as close to self-sufficiency as possible," Bullock said.

"My job is to accentuate, to build on that self-sufficiency. Their next move would be out on their own with no supervision at all," she explained.

Every day, Bullock picks her clients up from their jobs at the Big Lakes workshops.

"There is a form of communication by going out there every day. I find out how that person was today (from workshop staff). I take them home, and sit down and decide what we will do for the day. If there is no place specifically they need to go, we'll sit down and see if they're getting along with each other," Bullock said.

After their "powwow," Bullock said she helps the clients work on their daily goals. Each client is required to clean a certain percentage of the apartment in addition to their own room. Other goals include learning to balance a checkbook and getting to work on time in the morning. All goals are documented and the results evaluated, Bullock said.

"This is something you have to do. You've got to know how to dial that phone or turn on the gas oven without blowing the apartment away," Bullock said.

A former participant in the residential program is Theresa Cole. Besides her jobs in the Big Lakes janitorial and mailing workshops, she is considered a graduate of the center. She now lives independently in an apartment and is seeking work as a child care attendant.

"I had a bad thing with my temper. My mom couldn't handle me, and I was at Topeka State Hospital for nine years. I've wanted to give up (on Big Lakes training) a lot of times, but the staff always had a good reason for my staying. Without Big Lakes I wouldn't have had anywhere to go," Cole said.

Clients in both residential programs are encouraged to become involved in activities and to interact with people in the non-handicapped community.

Many K-State organizations and living groups sponsor fund-raising activities for Big Lakes. Groups also hold socially oriented activities for the clients, such as the annual FarmHouse Easter Egg Hunt.

Big Lakes always welcomes volunteers who can share their abilities in storytelling, music, food and cooking, art or almost anything people have to offer, Moore said.

Becky Stoskopf, senior in dietetics and institutional management, incorporated a class assignment into making a three-week cycle menu for clients in one of the Big Lakes houses.

"My teacher needed somebody in class to write a menu for them (clients) as a class project. When I got done with it, I felt like I had worked for a real reason — instead of handing it in and the teacher throwing it away," she said.

In creating the menu, Stoskopf visited with clients and their supervisors to create meals within the clients' abilities to prepare.

Stoskopf earned credit for another class project by giving a presentation to clients on sanitation in the home.

Working as a Big Lakes volunteer or staff member requires patience, empathy and the ability to handle stress, Moore said. Workers must be able to deal with those having a very limited intellectual capacity, he continued.

"It's a difficult population to work with. Emotional stress can result from the fact that mentally retarded people are never cured. Many of them may get better, but they are always going to be that way," he said.

"Even spending some spare time with clients just to go out for an ice-cream cone and talk is a step toward normalization," Bullock added.

Six clients of the Big Lakes Developmental Center live in this house where they are given the chance to be self-sufficient for the first time in their lives. The center owns three houses and rents two apartments where clients can live under limited supervision.

Jury finds Lavelle guilty of perjury, obstructing inquiry

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Rita Lavelle, former head of the government's $1.6 billion hazardous waste cleanup program, was convicted Thursday on three felony counts of perjury and one count of trying to obstruct a congressional inquiry.

After deliberating almost seven hours, the jury found Lavelle guilty of lying last February about the date she learned her former employer, Aero-Jet General Corp., was involved in a California waste dump.

The jury convicted her on two counts of lying before Senate and House committees about this fact and on one count of lying about the date in a sworn statement submitted to Congress.

Lavelle also was convicted of trying to obstruct a congressional inquiry by sending the false statement to Congress.

The only count for which the jury did not return a guilty verdict was a charge that Lavelle lied last February when she denied using her post at the Environmental Protection Agency to help Republican candidates.

However, on four of the five felony counts brought against Lavelle by a grand jury in August, the 10 women and two men on the jury found her guilty.

Lavelle, a former worker in President Reagan's office when he was governor of California, showed little emotion as the verdict was read. She leaned against the defense table as each count was read and seemed to sag a bit when the first guilty verdict was pronounced.

"I am very, very disappointed," Lavelle said as she emerged dry-eyed from the courtroom about 45 minutes after the verdict was handed down. "Unfortunately that is about all I can say at this point."

Lavelle, 36, faced five felony charges of perjury and obstructing a congressional investigation.

The jury also asked to see a document which formed the basis of two of the charges, a Dec. 13 letter Lavelle wrote explaining when she learned Aerojet-General had dumped wastes at the Stringfellow acid pits in California.

In the sworn statement and in later testimony before Congress, Lavelle maintained that she first learned about Aerojet's Stringfellow connection June 17, 1982.

The government contended that Lavelle was told about Aerojet on May 28, called an Aerojet official three days later to alert him of EPA's findings and continued her involvement until EPA officials pressured her to withdraw June 18.

Democrats denounce veto of Salvadoran certification

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Five private agencies promised Thursday to prepare their own report on human rights abuses in El Salvador, after President Reagan vetoed a bill that would have required Salvadoran political and social reforms as a condition of U.S. military aid.

At the same time, leading Democrats denounced Reagan's veto as likely to encourage right-wing death squads in El Salvador which recently have intensified killing of civilians regarded as politically suspect. The Democrats said they would resubmit the vetoed bill when Congress reconvenes Jan. 23.

The bill would have revived a two-year-old law that required Reagan to cut off military aid to the rightist Salvadoran government if he could not certify every six months that it was making progress on human rights and political and economic reforms. The next report would have been due Jan. 16.

Meanwhile, five anti-Sandinista groups told the United States they are prepared to end military operations against Nicaragua if that nation takes "credible steps" toward democracy, a senior American official said Thursday. The official, reporting on talks Thursday in Panama City between the anti-Sandinista leaders and Richard Stone, Reagan's special Central American envoy, said his report was intended to convey a message directly to Sandinista leaders in Managua.

Reagan killed the certification bill Wednesday night by withholding his signature when the midnight deadline passed for signing the measure. Because Congress is adjourned, the legislation dies under what is called a "pocket veto."

Foundation organizes fund-raising programs

By LAURI DIEHL
Collegian Reporter

Through annual telefunds and direct mail, K-State alumni are asked to contribute money to be used for scholarships and educational materials by the colleges.

Last year the K-State Foundation raised $4,210,300. Of this, $60,000 was raised in a fall mini-telefund and $281,000 in the spring telefund. Mailers, sent out in September, raised $91,000.

Tom Carlin, foundation director of communications, said not all funds come from telefunds and mailers.

"These are two of our regular fund-raising programs," he said. "But the majority of money comes in other ways."

Carlin said the foundation and the colleges work together on the telefund and mailers.

"We (the foundation) coordinate the mailer," he said. "We work on the graphics and get it printed. Each college writes its own message."

Money received through telefunds and direct mail goes to the participating college. Art Loub, foundation executive vice president, said that money from other sources is usually designated for specific colleges and programs.

"Only 3.9 percent of contributions are not designated," he said. "It used to be 10 to 15 percent. We have greatly accelerated college and departmental programs."

These programs have been increased, Loub said, because alumni have closer ties to their colleges or departments than to the University.

"If they (alumni) are asked, they may say they don't want to contribute to K-State, but they may want to give to the College of Business," he said.

Colleges and departments have jurisdiction over their own funds, Loub added.

"We assist colleges in raising funds," he said. "However, it is within their discretion as to how to spend the money."

Leslie Longberg, foundation controller, said all disbursements are reviewed by foundation staff members.

"The dean of the college has control of the money, but staff members check to be sure how money is spent," he said.

Colleges use these funds in various ways. The College of Business Administration is buying computers.

"The biggest single use (of funds) this year has been for the acquisition of educational computers," said Robert Lynn, dean of the College of Business. "We spent about $50,000 for computers this year." Scholarships were the second-largest expenditure, Lynn said.

The College of Education uses most of its funds for scholarships.

"About 96 percent of our funds go for scholarships and student aid," said Jordan Utsey, dean of the College of Education. "The rest is used for other internal needs that aren't state-funded, like publicity for the college or hosting events."

The College of Home Economics also uses most of its funds for scholarships.

"We use the money a variety of ways," said Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Home Economics. "Scholarships for incoming students are the primary use. Funds also are used for things like bringing in visiting professors for seminars and for equipment for teaching and research."

Defense request stirs Congressmen

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger is planning a Pentagon spending request for the next fiscal year of about $305 billion, an increase of nearly $55 billion or more than 21 percent over this year's level, congressional sources disclosed Thursday.

Several sources predicted a request that large would provoke a major election year fight in Congress, which fought a pitched battle with President Reagan over defense spending earlier this year before voting less money than he wanted.

A request that large also would become a certain issue in next year's presidential election campaign, should Reagan choose to seek a second term. All eight Democratic hopefuls favor cuts in the administration's buildup, although they differ widely on specifics.

It was not known whether Weinberger has forwarded the Pentagon's request for fiscal 1985 to the White House for Reagan's review. But one source said the spending blueprint "hasn't been thrashed out in front of the president yet." Reagan will ultimately decide how large a defense budget request to submit to Congress.

Congressional sources said Weinberger went over his proposal at a private breakfast meeting Wednesday with five key GOP leaders in the Senate, including Republican Leader Howard Baker of Tennessee.

One aide said Weinberger left at least some senators "pretty much stunned, pretty adamant they won't get a number that big."

"It's going to be a real donnybrook if they insist on asking for that large a number," this aide added.

A second source added the reaction was "very negative."

Other reaction included House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr.,

D-Mass., who said through a spokesman that a budget request that large for defense would be a "another disappointment."

Sources said the figure of $305 billion is comparable to spending this fiscal year of about $251 billion — $249 billion in the regular Defense Department appropriations bill that Reagan has signed into law and another $1.7 billion that Congress is certain to enact for military pay next spring.

The overall defense spending figure in both this year and 1985 would be higher when military construction and nuclear weapons research are included.

Interview requests posted Monday

All interview request forms for interviews to be conducted at the Career Planning and Placement Center Jan. 18 to Feb. 3, 1984, will be posted Dec. 5-9. No selected candidate list will be posted before Jan. 11.

Home Ec establishes scholarships

Fifteen $1,000 Dean's Scholarships have been established by the College of Home Economics to be awarded to incoming freshmen or transfer students entering a program of study in the college.

The scholarships will be offered to students who excel in chemistry, biology, psychology, sociology, business, art or home economics and have professional interest in nutrition, food science, textile science, nutrition in medicine, family and child development related to law, consumer economics, interior or apparel design or other specialties within the college.

Dean's Scholars must show potential for outstanding achievement in their chosen undergraduate degree program and meet designated criteria.

Biology professor receives grant

Brian Spooner, professor of biology, has received an award of $80,065 from the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute to continue immunological studies on cardiac contractile proteins. His research will focus on the developmental changes that convert certain cells of an embryo into cardiac muscles. The results will increase understanding of heart development and abnormal development leading to impaired cardiac function.

Professor gets award for research

Paul Kelly, associate professor of biology, has received a $232,142 grant from the National Institute of Neurological and Communicative Disorders and Stroke to support a three-year study of the molecular basis of synapse formation. A synapse is the point of contact between adjacent neurons, where nerve impulses are transmitted from one to another.

Survey predicts more jobs, less pay for college grads

By The Associated Press

LANSING, Mich. — The nation's employers plan to hire 5 percent more new college graduates in 1984 than they did this year, marking the first improvement in job prospects since 1981, says a Michigan State University survey issued Thursday.

But the study by placement director Jack Shingleton and assistant L. Patrick Scheetz predicts that starting salaries, adjusted for inflation, will be lower than in 1983.

"What we're seeing here is a very gradual improvement in the employment picture," Shingleton said at a news conference. "This is the first time in several years we see a plateau with a slight increase."

Last year's survey indicated the 1983 job market for new graduates was the worst since World War II, he said.

According to the survey of 617 businesses, government agencies and educational employers, average recipients of bachelor's degrees in 1984 can expect to earn annual salaries of $19,306 — 2.8 percent ahead of $18,768 in 1983, but lagging behind the 2.9 percent increase in the Consumer Price Index.

Assassination in Beirut prompts strict curfew

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — A man pretending to seek legal advice walked into the apartment of Lebanon's top Druse religious judge and assassinated him with a silenced pistol Thursday. The army, fearing revenge killings, clamped a curfew on Beirut and warned that citizens carrying arms would be shot.

Druse gunners hammered Lebanese army positions south of Beirut after the assassination and snipers killed a French peacekeeping soldier near the line separating Moslem west and Christian east Beirut. But a truce held in Tripoli between loyalists and rebels in the Palestine Liberation Organization.

In Washington, President Reagan and Lebanese President Amin Gemayel on Thursday repeated their call for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon.

Reagan said in a statement as Gemayel left for home that the two leaders "stand by the May 17 agreement as the best and most viable basis for the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Lebanon."

He also appealed to "other external forces" to leave as well, an obvious reference to Syria.

The Druse judge, 60-year-old Sheik Halim Takieddine, was a political moderate and was killed exactly one year after Druse leader Walid Jumblatt and his wife were wounded in car bombing just one block from Takieddine's west Beirut home.

There was no claim of responsibility for Takieddine's murder.

But at a news conference in Damascus, Jumblatt blamed the killing on the Druse's rightist Christian rivals, whom he claimed were operating in west Beirut under the cover of Lebanese authorities.

The Lebanese army command ordered a curfew on Beirut as of five p.m., and warned that violators would be arrested, that any citizen caught carrying a weapon would be shot and that people found hiding unauthorized arms would be "severely punished."

Murders of Druse leaders have in the past been followed by vengeance killings. In 1977, Walid Jumblatt's father, Druse leader Kamal Jumblatt, was assassinated near his mountain village of Moukhtara. Subsequently, about 200 Christians in nearby villages were killed.

Police said Takieddine's assailant contacted his victim by telephone Thursday morning requesting an appointment for a legal problem. When the man arrived at the first-floor apartment in the Sanayea district of west Beirut, he was let in by Takieddine's 13-year-old maid.

After the maid returned from preparing coffee, she found Takieddine lying dead on the floor with blood streaming from his head and neck, police said.

One police source said Takieddine was shot from the rear twice with a pistol equipped with a silencer. Beirut radio said he was hit by one bullet.

Beirut airport, where U.S. Marines of the multinational peacekeeping force are based, remained shut for the second day. Druse shelling sealed the terminal Wednesday, and Druse militiamen have threatened renewed shellfire unless Lebanon's army clears out of the area.

Advocate urges air bag use because of seat belt neglect

By The Associated Press

OVERLAND PARK — A consumer advocate, urging implementation of regulations "forcing people to save their own lives," said Thursday that voluntary use of seat belts has not been successful and airbags should be required.

Clyde Chapman, of the Consumer Affairs Association of Lawrence, spoke at the opening of a two-day Department of Transportation hearing in suburban Kansas City on whether airbags or automatic seatbelts should be required in all cars.

Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole told the hearing that the issue "needs to be resolved once and for all and for the benefit of all concerned."

A similar hearing was held earlier this week in Los Angeles, and a final public hearing will be held in Washington on Monday and Tuesday.

The hearings are the result of a U.S. Supreme Court decision that held that the Reagan administration was "arbitrary and capricious" when transportation officials overturned Carter administration regulations.

Those rules had required that air bags or automatic seat belts be installed in new cars beginning with some 1983 models.

After the series of hearings, the Department of Transportation will reinstate, modify or rescind those regulations, Dole said.

"In highway safety there are few if any decisions more important than the one we will reach," Dole said.

A final decision will be published by April 1984, she said, or July 1984 if new issues arise.

Helen Petruskas, vice-president of environmental and safety engineering for Ford Motor Co., recommended a four-year trial period in which all manufacturers would be required to equip 5 percent of their cars with automatic seat belts. Ford would also equip an undetermined number of those vehicles with air bags on the driver's side, she said.

Ford supports mandatory seat belt usage laws, she said. She predicted that states could quickly pass such laws and noted that in the past five years 41 states have passed laws requiring the use of child safety seats.

Also supporting mandatory seat belt laws was Michigan Secretary of State Richard Austin. It would take five to 10 years before most motorists had cars equipped with the automatic devices even if they were required, Austin said.

Austin also said the cost of the airbags could hurt the auto industry. "And the Lord knows they (cars) are hard enough to sell at present prices," he said.

But Chapman, of the consumer group, said laws requiring the use of seat belts would not bring high enough compliance. When manufactured in quantity, airbags would cost about $320 per car, Chapman said, estimating that the cost could eventually be lowered to $200 each.

"It's past time we stop hoping for miracles," Chapman said, noting that even with publicity drives to encourage the use of seat belts, only about 10 percent of the public does so.

"Built-in protectiveness is always better than relying on human actions or memory," Chapman said, pointing out that the federal government requires lawnmower manufacturers to install rock guards, and does not "just tell people to avoid rocks."

On display in the parking lot outside the hearing were two heavily damaged cars — an Oldsmobile Toronado and a Cadillac El Dorado. Signs on the cars told that airbags had allowed the occupants, who had not been wearing seat belts, to walk away from crashes that had occurred at 46 and 39 mph.

Nationwide, there are 6.5 million auto accidents and 50,000 auto-related deaths each year, Dole said, adding that traffic accidents are the fourth leading cause of deaths in the United States.

Wasteful government panels

When in doubt, form a commission and let the members work over the problem.

This has proved to be a favorite solution in Washington, as well as in the state governments, whenever problems arise. And we have gotten so accustomed to the idea of these committees that we refuse to see any of them killed, even if they accomplish virtually nothing at great expense.

President Reagan attempted to get rid of the civil rights panel, but an outcry brought it back to the brink of life. Reagan signed a bill Wednesday which revived the panel. While the panel has been useful in the past, there is very little else for it to do.

The final report of the panel said "most of the legislation necessary to guarantee civil rights to women...racial, ethnic and religious minorities...has been enacted." The report noted the need for the government to continue its action against discrimination.

We agree that the civil rights issue is not resolved. But we doubt that it will be improved by a panel which has no power to do anything else to improve the situation.

Government officials should stop passing off responsibilities upon non-elected personnel. Such commissions are often filled with friends and acquaintances of the officials, therefore, one can often question whether some members of the commission have the proper qualifications.

So we may be paying these commissioners a healthy salary to do a job that they aren't qualified to do, if the commission in fact has a valid purpose. And all too often, the purpose of a commission is only to pass the buck on an issue which our elected officials are afraid to touch.

The saying goes that the less government there is, the better. If we want to cut the federal budget, we can start with some of the many commissions. Outside of the military budget, much of the financial waste in government comes in the form of the panels. Cutting many of them will be a great step in the right direction. The more people involved in government, the more waste and corruption there can be.

Boosting education dollars

Would you trust your future to someone who, on the average, makes less than $20,000 a year?

Believe it or not, this is exactly what is happening in Kansas. According to Dr. Robert V. Haderlein of Girard, a member of the National Commission on Excellence in Education, the average pay for a beginning teacher with a college degree is $12,769. After 12 years of experience, this figure rises all the way to $17,000.

An engineer, fresh out of college and in his first job, can expect to make $12,000 in six months.

Haderlein called this low pay "a sad condition." I call it a misplacement of values.

Don't get me wrong. Engineers are worth whatever they can get. The top pay should go to the brightest, the ones who work the hardest and the ones with experience. But why can't the same be true for public school teachers?

Haderlein and Gov. John Carlin addressed the Kansas Association of School Boards on Monday. Both men said higher teacher salaries are the key to improving Kansas' educational system. Both are correct.

Haderlein, a past president of both the KASB and the National School Boards Association, said only five percent of the high school students who took the Scholastic Aptitude Test in 1982 indicated they planned to become teachers. A large reason for this low percentage is the low salaries in education, he said.

Carlin noted that many school board members were concerned about the low salaries. He also questioned the use of merit pay under the present system.

"I feel a lot more confident knowing many of you also agree that it's very difficult to implement any kind of meaningful merit pay system when our base salary is not where it should be," Carlin said.

Haderlein laid the obvious but not popular conclusion — where the money must come from for the higher salaries — on the board members present at the convention.

"It's up to you, the school board members, to bite the bullet and make the decisions that must be made, and in most instances it's not going to be a popular decision," Haderlein said.

Last spring, Carlin proposed to allocate $15 million to a teachers' salary enrichment program. This program would give school districts money for the sole purpose of improving teachers' salaries. The Kansas Legislature, through committee work, eliminated the program.

After the death of this proposal,

House Speaker Mike Hayden, R-Atwood, proposed offering scholarships to students who enter student teaching programs. The purpose of this proposal was to get more college students to become teachers.

It was a lucrative proposal. If a student enrolled in an education college, his tuition would be paid by the state. In addition, the state would kick in an additional $100 per semester for books. Mathematics and science education majors would have received an additional $400 per semester, in order to help defray costs and help boost the areas where teachers are needed most.

The only string attached to Hayden's plan was that a student had to become certified to teach in Kansas. It had no enforcement to keep students from having a "free ride" through college, become certified to teach and then take a job in private industry.

Needless to say, Hayden's proposal also died.

There is good news, however. The economy is picking up. The severance tax is pumping money into the state's coffers. Citizens are becoming concerned about the quality of education the youth are receiving, especially after the release of "A Nation at Risk," a report which dealt with the problems in the American educational system.

The big question is who will pay for the improvements? The federal government is one answer, but few school district patrons want the hassles of red tape which inevitably come with the bucks.

The state government is another possibility, but once again, red tape with the money is a problem. Most patrons and school boards don't want to lose what "local control" of their schools they have to some bureaucrat in Topeka (or Washington or anywhere else away from "home").

Local financing appears to be the answer, but raising taxes is never a popular issue, especially when one is recovering from a recession. The possibility of property reassessment is on the horizon, meaning property taxes may increase in the near future. And with increasing utility rates, the increased cost of living and about 99 other factors thrown in, the possibility of taxpayers voting to increase their tax burden appears remote.

So what is the answer? I believe the answer lies in a combination of state and local financing. Carlin said he will submit an educational program to the 1984 Legislature which will basically be the same as the one he offered last year. I think it should be implemented in addition to increases in local financing.

In order to keep quality teachers, one must be willing to pay the price. Kansas is raising its requirements for teacher certification; it must also raise the salaries paid to keep competent teachers in classrooms.

There also will need to be some cutting of programs. Probably the first programs to be cut will be extra-curricular activities. I hope this doesn't happen. These activities not only increase the pleasure of learning, but they teach some very important skills which can be used later in life. These skills include good sportsmanship, the ability to cope with pressure in a competitive world, teamwork, loyalty, cooperation and other qualities too numerous to mention.

I asked a question at the beginning of this column that has gone unanswered until now. Whether you want to believe it or not, this state's future, as well as the future of this nation and world, rests with today's students.

We will expect these students to conquer new diseases, save dying species, cure cancer, find new sources of energy, increase the world's food supply, develop new means of transportation and about a billion other responsibilities. These responsibilities are the same ones which have been passed on from generation to generation.

Since we will expect the best from these students, we also must be willing to pay for the best people to educate them. Any other solution is inadequate.

The KASB is to be commended for allowing Carlin and Haderlein to speak on the issue of higher pay for teachers. It is now up to Kansans to speak up and tell their school boards what they want and that they are willing to pay for it, so the boards can make the improvement of teachers' salaries more than just empty rhetoric.

"BUBBLE, BUBBLE, TOL AND TROUBLE"

Starting to write

(Author's Note: This is the first of two columns on what caused me to become a writer.)

During much of my life, most people who have known me have thought of me as a writer. Certainly writing is the activity which has absorbed most of my energy.

Even when I've done other things, I've been referred to as a writer by those with whom I worked. Between 1942 and 1948, for example, when I worked several times in a lemon packinghouse in Southern California, my co-workers never called me a laborer (which is how they thought of themselves), in spite of the fact that at one time or another I did every kind of physical labor required in the various jobs in that packinghouse. Instead, they would always say, "Joel? Oh, you mean the guy who writes poetry!" And that's the way it's always been, regardless of what I might have been doing to earn a living.

I've often wondered what influence or impulse it is which causes an individual to pursue a particular activity. Why does someone become a chemist? Or an athlete, a farmer, a preacher, a certified public accountant, an engineer? Or whatever it is a person becomes. What generates the interest in a particular activity in the first place?

Of course, the prime cause will vary from person to person. Nevertheless, I believe that an event or sequence of events somehow starts each person down the path leading to whatever activity subsequently is pursued. This event or sequence of events isn't always remembered afterwards — but it is there.

I know that I did not start out to be a writer. When I was very young I had no notion of following such an occupation. Even though I read a great deal, I never visualized myself as being a person who might one day write. I wanted to be many things — but never a writer. I remember one time when I was about 12 years old I wanted to become a chicken farmer. I used to think someday I might be a salesman. On occasion I imagined myself as an explorer.

Then a sequence of events "happened" to me when I was 15 years old which I remember very clearly — a sequence of events which I believe caused me to become a writer.

In 1937, my father was fired from a teaching position he had held for four years in a private denominational high school in Southern California. The only position he could find was as a parish preacher for a small congregation in the Allegheny mountains of north-central Pennsylvania.

The nearest town to his church was called Granville, which had a population of about 100 people. That village was seven miles from Lewistown, which had a population of 12,000. We lived in half of a farmhouse owned by Old Jake Brindle. The house had no electricity and no central heating. The bedrooms upstairs and the living room were as cold as tombs — and all reading was done in the kitchen by the spluttering light of a kerosene lamp. My mother did the cooking on a wood stove, which also gave off most of the heat in the house.

The farm was two miles from Granville, the only way to get to that village being either down a dirt road next to the Juniata River (which bordered the farm) or walking along the bright railroad tracks which ran 100 yards or so from the house. To get to school that year, I walked each morning, sun or snow, mud or dry ground, down the ribbon of railroad track to Granville, where I met the school bus which took me the seven miles to Lewistown and the high school.

That year I was ready to begin my junior year in high school. On the second day of classes, John J. Fagan, the English teacher, stood in front of his third-period class and wearily gave as an assignment the writing of a theme to be titled "My Life." I've often thought since that he must have given that same assignment many times before and had grown bored with it.

Mr. Fagan was a tall man, well over 6 feet. It was whispered around school that he drank a great deal. His florid, flabby jowls seemed to support that belief. It was also whispered that he didn't really care about teaching. I believe I found out differently. As I think about it now, it's conceivable to me that he might not have cared about most students — but I do think he cared about teaching. Or, if not that, then he most certainly must have cared about literature and writing. That much, at least, was going to be shown to me beyond any doubt.

His assignment challenged me. I don't know exactly why. It had something to do with the fact that there was a turning point going on in our life as a family at the time. My father was now 53 years old — and for him to be fired had been a traumatic experience. Even though he had served his church for 28 years — as a preacher and teacher and missionary — this pastorate in Pennsylvania was not offered him until late in the summer. Moreover, the appointment was for only one year. Naturally, however, my father took it. It was, in a sense, a last gasp for him — at least, I'm certain that's the way it must have seemed to him at the time.

Likewise, I was personally aware that this was a turning point in my own life. My two older brothers had gone their own ways, with the result that I was now the oldest child still living at home. I believe it was because of these familial and personal elements that Mr. Fagan's assignment challenged me. In a sense, it was the first time I had ever been asked to activate my memory!

How I met that challenge and the consequences of what I did will be detailed in my next column.

Grant recipients don't want free ride

Editor,

I deeply resent your implications that students receiving Pell Grants are seeking a "free ride" to an education. You seem to believe that we would rather fill out BEOG forms than lift a finger to "earn" an education. That's ridiculous. Obviously you are seriously misinformed.

Students receiving grants are neither allergic to work nor a flock of pigeons waiting to be fed. Instead we are utilizing the available resources we have in order to get an education. Is there anything wrong with that?

Any student getting a Pell Grant can attest to the fact that they help to pay tuition at registration and maybe help purchase textbooks, but nothing more. The rest of the semester most of us work in order to keep up with the cost of an education.

The majority of students who receive grants aren't eligible for work study so the money earned is less than that of a student in work study. There is also a shortage of jobs open to student ineligible for work study, so that many students who wish to work can't.

Rather than condemn the government for increasing funds for Pell Grants we should applaud them. Although it is unfortunate that work study has been cut, we still need to remember that these programs provide for an education to hopefully eliminate ignorance, as you have so blatantly displayed.

Editor,

We attended the K-State-Oral Roberts basketball game and were shocked at how the crowd at Ahearn Field House reacted. What happened to the enthusiastic students who would stand up and cheer for the Wildcats? I can remember when opponents were afraid to play in Ahearn because of the crowd. So the next time you attend a game let's stand up and cheer and become involved in the game. Don't just sit there and stare at the court. Let's show the team and coaches that the students are behind them. Let's show them some Purple Pride.

Campus ASK director reflects on past, future programs

By MIKE HEDGES
Collegian Reporter

A successful year for the Associated Students of Kansas has gone unnoticed by many K-State students.

Brett Lambert, campus director for the group spoke Thursday to about 50 people in the Union Caskeller as part of the Union Program Council's "Let's Talk About It" series.

"A lot of students have no idea what ASK even does. Some think that we just support or reject bills. But we create bills, too," Lambert said.

He said he is proud of the fact that last year every bill ASK supported or created was passed in the legislature.

"Last year was our most successful year. At our legislative assemblies, where we define our goals for the following year, we decided on three main goals and were successful on all three," he said.

ASK lobbied for passage of the student work-study program, which matches students with jobs in the Manhattan area related to their major. The University agrees to pay half of the student's wages and the employer pays the other half.

"This year the state paid half of $562,000, and the odds are good there will be a 7 percent increase in the following year," Lambert said.

ASK also lobbied for a tuition savings bill to ease financial pressures on student.

"In the past it was agreed that the state pays 75 percent of a student's tuition and the student 25 percent.

"It was eventually inevitable that tuition would increase, so we asked for a cushion. The work-study program is part of that deal," Lambert said.

He also said the state of Kansas pays the highest percentage of tuition per-capita income, so students pay the lowest percentage in the nation.

ASK's other goal last year was to keep the legal drinking age at 18 years of age, in accordance with the wishes of the majority of students.

"It was a hard-fought battle last year, and it isn't over. But we don't anticipate it being as hard this year," he said.

Lambert said in recent years, ASK has stayed away from taking a stand on social issues because of the lingering effects of such stands.

"Eight years ago, we took a stand on the legalization of marijuana. And, this summer when I was in Washington, that seemed to be the only thing our representatives could remember about ASK. It seems they didn't know about all the good things we have done."

Lambert also spoke about some of the goals ASK has for this year.

"According to the Educational Testing Service, 15 percent of the 11th grade students in Kansas are functionally illiterate," Lambert said. "But 97 percent graduate when they are seniors. I don't think they magically learn to read in a year."

"What ASK wants is for the requirements for high school graduation to be harder, and we want these standards to be set by the Board of Regents instead of the (local boards) of education," he said.

ASK also supports the concept of merit pay for high school teachers, Lambert said, but at the same time doesn't know how it can be implemented fairly until there is a base salary for all teachers.

Lambert also addressed ASK's involvement on the K-State campus.

"My first obligation is to Farrell Library," he said.

"I think, even though the Union is a wonderful place, it is unfortunate that it is the center of student activity."

"It's well known that we have the worst library system in the Big Eight (Conference). But it's very hard to do any better when the library's budget is cut by 50 percent as it was this year," he said.

Lambert also is concerned about the lack of facilities for handicapped students at K-State.

"K-State right now only does as much as it has to for handicapped students. It's the least accessible campus for handicapped people in the Big Eight."

"It's ridiculous to me that the shuttle bus picks someone up at 5 p.m. on Friday and they sit in their dorm rooms until 8 a.m. Monday because they can't get around," he said.

ASK also will support paying higher salaries to faculty because, he said, "that is the only way to keep up a quality educational atmosphere."

Increased funding for ASK is another goal, Lambert said.

"I'm not talking about a $10 or even a $5 increase. We just need more money to make people aware of what we do."

"People should remember that ASK is the only lobbying voice the students have in the state of Kansas," he said.

ASK was conceived in 1969 by State Rep. Robert Hein as a lobbying group for Kansas students, but it wasn't until 1973 that the group was finally formed.

Dole to seek Senate Majority Leader post

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Sen. Robert Dole, R-Kan., announced Thursday that he is seeking the job of Senate Majority Leader and has contacted 25 to 30 colleagues about supporting him for the post next year.

Although the Finance Committee chairman has hinted in the past that he would be interested in the job being vacated by the retiring Sen. Howard Baker, R-Tenn., the latest comments were Dole's first outward indication of a broad campaign for the office.

Dole joins a list of other Senate Republicans whom aides have said are interested in the party's top Senate job. They include Richard Lugar of Indiana, Ted Stevens of Alaska, James McClure of Idaho and possibly Pete Domenici of New Mexico.

In an interview on CBS radio, Dole said the prospects now look good for the GOP to preserve its Senate majority in next year's elections. Asked what his chances were to win the majority leader's job, he cracked, "well, it's a tough precinct."

In other comments, Dole rose to the defense of President Reagan's ostracized chief economic adviser Martin Feldstein, saying the economist is only stating the facts when he identifies the administration's tax cuts and defense spending as part of the reason for massive budget deficits.

Dole has been one of Feldstein's staunchest Capitol Hill allies, and together they have pressured the White House for tax increases to help trim federal red ink. But Feldstein was put on notice Wednesday to either stop publicly criticizing White House policy, or resign.

Dole counterattacked at Treasury Secretary Donald Regan, Feldstein's opposite number in the deficit debate, saying the secretary "insults the intelligence of Congress" by suggesting new tax revenue would only go for new spending and not to reduce the deficit.

"There's been a lot of misunderstanding. We're supporters of the president," said Dole, chairman of the tax-writing Senate Finance Committee. He has been pushing for a $150 billion package of new taxes and spending cuts to reduce the deficit, a package shunned by Regan and largely ignored by Congress.

"We don't appreciate Secretary Regan making speeches around, insulting Republican members of Congress...He can't shrink deficits by making speeches attacking the Congress."

Insect index rates 'nuisance level'

DETROIT — A.L. Eavy was just itching to tell America's bug experts about his new index to insects.

The former Michigan State University student told the Entomological Society of America meeting in Detroit on Wednesday that he has devised a system that rates the "nuisance levels" of nine types of annoying insects throughout the state.

He said it's designed to help parks and recreation officials identify areas where bugs are getting under people's skin.

"If you're going to develop new recreational sites, you have to take into account what pests are there," Eavy said.

Eavy said his information came from staffers in 86 of the state's recreational areas who filled out weekly reports based on visitors' complaints. The results were compiled by a computer.

His system is unusual because it does not measure just the number of bugs, but what people say is irritating, Eavy said.

"We're not counting bugs," he said. "What we're monitoring is impact. Once there's a bug bite or houseflies crawling over your salad, it affects a park's success."

"... With this type of rating, you could choose the type of insect you vacation with."

Gorilla's football predictions cease

DALLAS — Kanda the Great's reign as a football prognosticator has gotten out of hand, so the gorilla will soon resume his place as just another ape at the Dallas Zoo.

Kanda's brief shot at glory began with successful betting on National Football League games and expanded into offers to challenge roulette wheels and Wall Street.

Dallas Morning News sports columnist David Casstevens gave the gorilla his start several weeks ago by challenging him to select football winners. The animal did better than many pro gamblers with a 33-22-1 record over four weeks.

But the media did Kanda in. The three major TV networks and 100 newspapers and radio stations went ape over the endangered lowland gorilla, calling for interviews with Bill Stewart, marketing officer for the zoo.

Stewart even did a 20-minute interview with the British Broadcasting Corp.

"Kanda needs some time to rest," Stewart said. "And frankly, so do we. We've got 2,000 other animals here, and they deserve our attention, too."

Reporters weren't the only ones interested, however. Stewart said the zoo has been besieged from bettors demanding Kanda's selections.

"After a while, it became a lot of people who wouldn't even identify themselves. I'd pick up a phone and hear some gruff voice say, 'Who's the ape got this week?'"

Old desk sells for $1.34 million

LONDON — A Louis XVI desk made in 1778 was sold to London art dealer Alexander Berendt for $1.34 million Thursday, a spokesman for Christie's auction house said.

The porcelain-mounted desk by Martin Carlin, a celebrated French furniture maker, is decorated with floral porcelain flaps around the sides and with drawers at each end that are released by concealed steel buttons. The seller asked to remain anonymous.

A previous owner was Anna Thomson Dodge of the Detroit auto family, who collected French furniture at her "French chateau," Rose Cottage on the edge of Lake Sinclair outside Detroit, said Christie's spokesman Peter Rose. Christie's sold the desk in June 1971 for $414,070 during a $4.78 million sale of a collection owned by Mrs. Dodge.

Man travels to London to buy 'Cabbage' doll

By The Associated Press

SHAWNEE — A Kansas City mailman, making his rounds in search of a Cabbage Patch doll, flew to London Thursday so he could buy one of the prized Christmas presents for his 5-year-old daughter.

Edward Pennington, 44, who lives in the Kansas City suburb of Shawnee, arrived at Heathrow airport in pursuit of one of the rag dolls for his daughter, Leana.

"My daughter Leana was almost in tears because we couldn't get one," Pennington said. "I heard that there were some in London so I decided to jump on a plane, pick one up, go straight back to the airport and fly home again."

Reporters of Britain's Daily Star met Pennington at the plane, whisking him away for an exclusive interview as reporters from other British papers chased after them.

The Daily Star exchanged five Cabbage Patch dolls for the exclusive interview, but even the newspaper didn't have an easy time finding them.

After scouring London with no success, the Daily Star found them in Bristol, 100 miles to the south, and bought five for $182.50.

Pennington's wife, Maggie, is a flight attendant for Trans World Airlines. She said she was able to get a reduced fare of $200 for the flight, although the British Press Association reported the trip cost Pennington $657.

"I was out all day Tuesday looking for one and couldn't find one," Mrs. Pennington said. "I called Penney's because I had heard they were taking a list, but they said the list was too long, they were sold out and weren't taking any more names. We were just about ready to tell Leana to put a hold on it and that we would do the best we could to get one after Christmas."

Pennington decided to fly to London after seeing a report on a local television station that Londoners weren't afflicted with the Cabbage Patch craze like Americans were, and that many dolls were available, Mrs. Pennington said.

Salesmen at the prestigious Harrods in London reported meeting at least a dozen Americans making special trips for the hard-to-find dolls whose chubby-cheeked — some would say ugly — faces had captured their children's hearts.

The floppy dolls, each one a little different from the other, come complete with birth certificates and adoption papers for $36.18 in London stores.

Harrods spokesman Hilary Close said the dolls have been going like hotcakes.

"We sold more than 200 Wednesday and we've had to limit them to three to a customer," she said. "We're being mobbed for them, but we haven't had any fighting — yet."

Student Senate passes bill to select Nichols art council

By LAURI DIEHL
Collegian Reporter

In its final meeting of the semester, Student Senate established the Nichols Hall Art Committee to solicit bids and select art for the lobby of Nichols, using a $10,000 fund set up in 1975.

Originally the fund was a contribution to help establish an art gallery in Nichols Gym after renovation. A gallery was included in the original renovation plans, but there is none included in the plans for the renovation now underway.

Renovation is scheduled for completion in the fall of 1985.

Established was a committee comprised of the current student body president, senate chairman, University art curator, two students in art-related fields, two other students and one senator. The 1984-85 student body president and senate chairman also will be included. The bill was revised to require the approval of senate's Finance Committee and senate itself for the art selected.

Jerry Katlin, student body president and one of the bill's sponsors, was asked about the type of art that should be selected.

"All I know is that I want artwork, I want it in Nichols' lobby and I want a plaque commemorating student involvement in saving Nichols," Katlin said.

Katlin was asked if placing the artwork outside Nichols would be considered.

"It is important on a project of this magnitude to have some guidelines set before it begins," he said. "I have nothing against this option, but we have to be careful of having too many options."

Mary Lynn Manning, arts and sciences senator, objected to obtaining the art before the renovation is completed.

"I wonder if we can choose a piece of art for this building before it's completed," she said. "Plans could be altered after the art is selected." She suggested waiting to select the artwork until the building is completed.

Bill Sullivan, graduate senator, disagreed.

"I'm in favor of looking at artwork right now," he said. "The plans won't be changed much, and they are available for the committee to see."

Lori Leu, senate chairman and the bill's other sponsor, also opposed waiting.

"It will take a long time to get a piece of art if we wait until 1985 to look for it," she said. "The architect-tural firm is willing to work with us."

Senate also passed three finance bills. One bill revised Student Governing Association spending regulations, adding regulations that would prohibit any SGA allocated money from being spent on "parties, social functions or banquets" and "clothing" unless they are approved by the Finance Committee and senate.

Another bill revision included the Sports Club Council, Fine Arts Council and International Coordinating Council in council funding. The third finance bill set up the 1984-85 Spending Policy for Councils.

Manhattan Plays Host to Spies

On December 26, 27, and 28 the city of Manhattan will play host to a convocation of a special group. This group of 800-1,000 fanatical supporters of Khomeini, coming to Manhattan from all across the U.S., is better known as a group of agents of Khomeini's barbaric regime. Interesting that, at the time of the hostage crisis several years ago this group was facing "sanctions" of many kinds. Now, however, it is business as usual with this reactionary regime and its lackies. They are given the educational facilities of Manhattan High School in which to have their meetings and plan their activities. In the evenings they can enjoy a good night's rest at the Ramada Inn.

All these facilities are provided for a group who, by their own admission, has been providing information on progressive opponents of the regime for the Islamic Republic of Iran.

We appeal to the citizens of Manhattan to voice their concern about the use of public educational facilities for such a purpose.

We appeal to the private sector of Manhattan commerce not to put profit before principle and the safety of others.

We appeal to the city of Manhattan to refuse to harbor scoundrels.

Finally, we would like to bring to the attention of Manhattan residents and the K-State community that these are the same thugs that had attacked other Iranian students on the day of Sheik Zaki Yamani's speech. This group has also participated in other brutal attacks in many other cities which have been well documented and publicized in both the local and national press.

Want To Sell Your Books ?

Question: How does the Union Bookstore determine how much your books are worth when you sell them back?

Answer: If the Bookstore has notification from the instructor that the books are to be re-adopted for use the next semester, and if the Bookstore does not already have a sufficient stock on hand, then you will be offered 60% of the publisher's current list price.

For example: if a book sells for $10 new and it meets the requirements noted above, the book would be bought from you for $6.

If the Bookstore has not received notice that the book will be used again, or if it already has a sufficient stock on hand, the book would be worth the current wholesale price as indicated by one of the nation's largest jobbers of used textbooks.

If you have any questions about the price being paid for a textbook, the buyer will be happy to answer any questions which you may have regarding the price paid.

Question: Is 60% the usual price paid for textbooks around the country?

Answer: Definitely not. Most stores in the United States pay only 50% for books being used again. The Union Bookstore is one of the few stores which pays 60%. And remember, we pay cash. You don't have to take your money out in trade.

Question: What about paperbacks? Does the 60% policy apply to them too?

Answer: Yes. The Union Bookstore does not penalize you on paperbacks. If they are being used again, and if the bookstore needs them, you will receive 60% of the publisher's list price.

Question: If the publisher's price has gone up since I bought my books, will I receive the benefit of that price increase?

Answer: Yes. For instance, if you bought your book for $9 and the publisher's list price is now $10, you will get $6, not $5.40.

Student sails through college courses

By KELLY ROBINSON
Staff Writer

More than one soon-to-be college graduate has promised himself that he would "take a year or so off and see the world" before plunging into the nine-to-five life.

But getting that worldly education does not necessarily have to wait until after commencement — not if it's done the way Carl Davis did it.

Davis, junior in pre-law, was one of 400 participants in a semester-at-sea program sponsored last spring by the University of Pittsburgh.

The program offers college students the chance to sail around the world while taking classes aboard a ship.

Davis learned of the program from two friends who had taken a similar trip.

"I had only seen the ocean twice and I had never been on a ship before. I was so scared I would get seasick," he said, adding later that he had no real trouble adapting to life at sea.

While aboard the S.S. Universe, a converted luxury liner, Davis earned 12 college credit hours, all transferable to K-State. He said classes were conducted in much the same manner as one would expect to find on any ordinary campus — the difference being, of course, that this one floats.

"I had a class in business, geology, political science and a Core class," he said, explaining that Core was a sort of social studies class in which the students learned about each port they were to visit.

Spending approximately two hours in class every day left plenty of time for leisure.

"I figured if I made an A in any of my classes, I studied too much," Davis said. "You just studied enough to pass. It was not so much the studying that you are there for, it's to see the world and learn about other cultures and meet new people."

Ship offers semester-at-sea

Life at sea took some getting used to, Davis said. For instance, his room had no porthole, so every morning he awoke to complete darkness. The constant rocking of the ship was a bit disturbing at first, he said, but later proved to be very relaxing.

Sailing from Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., on Jan. 26, the ship made its way to the Mediterranean Sea. During February, Davis said the ship docked in Cadiz, Spain; Athens, Greece; and Istanbul, Turkey.

While the ship was in port, which was usually about four days, the students were released from classroom responsibilities and were on their own for food and lodging.

"One of the things I did was tour Europe by train," Davis said. "I just took off by myself. Nobody else (from the ship) wanted to do what I wanted to do, so I went by myself. It was great."

He did, however, run into a familiar face or two while on his journey.

"I ran into this girl from the ship while I was at the Louvre in Paris. It was wild," he said.

On March 8, the S.S. Universe and its passengers were shipwrecked about a 1½ miles off the coast of Alexandria, Egypt. The incident shortened the cruise by about six weeks.

Davis related the story:

The students were awakened that morning and informed that due to the rough waters, the Egyptians were not able to send out a pilot (someone familiar with the harbor) to guide the ship into port.

After lunch, Davis said he remembers he was watching "Horsefeathers," a Groucho Marx movie on closed-circuit television, when the ship jolted to a halt.

The captain, in his attempt to go into the harbor unassisted, had run into a sand bar. The ship was grounded and had begun to lean.

At about 3 p.m., a tugboat was sent out but was unsuccessful in throwing a line to the ship.

"Now we were starting to get a little nervous," he said.

One of the biggest problems throughout the ordeal was dealing with language barriers.

"Our captain was Chinese and he was trying to communicate with Egyptians and there were all kinds of interpretation problems," he said.

The head of the Egyptian Navy and a U.S. Ambassador also were called in for assistance.

"You can imagine 400 American students shipwrecked in Egypt — it could have been a big deal," Davis said.

At 11 p.m., Davis said the captain called for the aid of all "able-bodied men" to form a bucket brigade to get the luggage out of "the greasy portions of the ship."

This was done in order to slow the amount of water the ship was taking on.

"Now we were really getting scared," he said, "because we could see all the Chinese crewmen running around with these terrified looks on their faces."

Davis said he learned later that the real danger was not that the ship would sink but that the water would reach the boilers and cause an explosion.

At 12:30 a.m., all the students were ordered to stand by on the lifeboat deck.

About four hours later, the ship drifted away from the sand bar. The Egyptians would still not send out another tugboat, but the captain went on into port anyway. This time he was successful.

Once in port, it was determined that the S.S. Universe would have to go back to Greece to be repaired. This marked the end of the cruise.

The students spent a week and a half in Egypt and were then loaded onto 15 buses and taken to Israel. They stayed in the Diplomat Hotel in Jerusalem and finished the last six weeks of classes there.

Although his world cruise may have come to a surprising halt, Davis said the trip was well worth it.

"You find out a lot about other cultures. You meet new and interesting people and make friends for life," he said. "It was definitely an adventure unparalleled."

Vatican offers guidance in sex education

By The Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — The Vatican issued a statement on sex education Thursday, calling non-marital sexual relations a grave and selfish disorder, and urging the courts to protect the young from pornography in the mass media.

The Holy See emphasized that parents have the primary role in sexual education and urged them to become involved in shaping such programs in schools. "Silence is not a valid norm of conduct in this matter," it added.

In a document called "Educational Guidance in Human Love," the Vatican praised virginity, called masturbation a deviation reflecting immaturity, and said homosexuals should be counseled with understanding for their "disorder."

The 36-page statement is the product of several years of study initiated by Pope John Paul II and conducted by the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education. The Vatican did not say when the work was started.

It is designed as guidance for "parents, teachers and other educators," especially those dealing with youth, the Vatican said.

Such a document can carry great persuasive force among the world's more than 790 million Roman Catholics.

The congregation said of sex education: "Openness and collaboration of parents with other educators who are co-responsible for formation, will positively influence the maturation of young people."

One Vatican source said: "This will encourage parents to become more involved in public and Catholic school sex education programs."

"It also lends support to the Catholic dioceses, for instance in the United States, that already have started sex education programs," added the source, who asked not to be identified by name.

The congregation said sex outside marriage constitutes a "grave disorder."

The congregation, headed by U.S. Cardinal William Baum, went on to condemn "manifestations of the merely genital which are a moral disorder because they are outside the matrimonial context of authentic love." It indicated that "adolescents and young adults" were the major offenders in this.

Turning to the role of government, the Vatican congregation said: "It is the task of the state to safeguard its citizens against injustices and moral disorders."

Lawyer asks state's high court to alter compensation rules

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas should change its case law and award workers' compensation for provable, severe mental injury even if no physical injury was involved in a work-related accident, a southeast Kansas lawyer told the state Supreme Court Thursday.

If it does that, said the opposing counsel in a case heard by the court, Kansas industry will be subjected to a "Pandora's Box" of compensation claims based on vague definitions of what constitutes mental trauma.

The case involves the award by a Montgomery County District Court judge of workers' compensation to Tracy Followill, who was 20 years old in August of 1981 when he witnessed the death of a co-worker in a die machine in the Emerson Electric Co. plant at Independence.

A decision on the company's appeal of that ruling should be announced by the Supreme Court on Jan. 13, under normal handling.

It is the first time the state Supreme Court has been asked to decide the issue of whether workers' compensation can be awarded for alleged mental injury when there is no evidence of physical injury to the person making the claim.

Monty K. Heasty of Independence, the attorney for Emerson Electric, said the court's ruling will have great impact on Kansas industry if it agrees with Judge Floyd Van Palmer, who found for Followill at the trial court level.

"This question is important to industry of Kansas," Heasty told the court. "It's going to put a great burden if they're going to have to be the mental guarantor of their employees. I do not think that industry ought to bear that burden."

However, Russell D. Canaday, another Independence attorney who represents Followill, disputed that contention, saying it would require competent medical evidence that the worker had indeed suffered severe mental trauma before compensation would be awarded.

"As far as the Pandora's Box goes...I think you can see from our own case history that this is not an easy thing to prove," said Canaday. "The mere fact that you see the accident is only part of the game.

There's got to be competent medical evidence that seeing the accident has impaired your ability to carry on the job."

The basic facts in the case were not disputed by the two lawyers.

Followill was working as a maintenance man in the Emerson plant when he saw a worker mangled by a die machine.

Canaday said at first Followill thought what he saw flying from the machine was excess material, but quickly recognized it as flesh.

He became extremely upset and was taken home from work, then was hospitalized in Independence. Later he was transferred to the psychiatric unit of a Pittsburg hospital. He did not return to work until November of 1981, and retains a phobia about machinery, the lawyers said. There was testimony that he now can perform about 70 percent of his work.

An administrative law judge under the state's workers' compensation procedure denied his claim for compensation, citing numerous state court decisions which concluded there must be physical injury to receive benefits.

Canaday said Judge Palmer agreed Followill had suffered traumatic neurosis known as "post dramatic stress disorder," even though he sustained no physical injury, and should be eligible for workers' compensation.

If the Supreme Court agrees, said Heasty, the effect will be to "overrule a significant number of this court's decisions and...open a Pandora's Box every time someone witnesses a tragic accident."

Heasty said four tests should be applied before compensation is awarded: Was there physical injury? Does the worker have the proper symptoms of the claimed mental condition? Does diagnosis show it directly led to the mental condition? Is there a direct "causal connection" between the work being performed and the mental condition?

"The four elements just do not exist in this case," he said.

He said every ruling by the Kansas Supreme Court in the past has required the presence of a physical injury.

Chips fall back in place for Vegas casinos

By The Associated Press

RENO, Nev. — The jangling, clanking sounds of prosperity are growing louder in Nevada's casinos as they rebound from a cold streak caused by the recession and competition from gambling in Atlantic City, N.J.

But experts say the high-rolling boom years of the 1960s and '70s are gone, never to be seen again.

"There are surface indications that the gaming industry is healthier than it has been for quite a while," said University of Nevada-Reno economist Bill Eadington. "But the rate of growth for the industry is probably never going to hit its 1978 levels again."

Atlantic City, which legalized casinos in 1979, has siphoned off some gamblers from Nevada. Many have been the free-spending "high rollers" who are sometimes flown in at a casino's expense.

But more importantly, experts say, the 52-year-old legalized gambling industry in Nevada has matured beyond the years of double-digit growth.

Gambling revenues grew at a healthy 10.8 percent a year during the 1960s and a frenetic 15.3 percent annually during the 1970s. At the time, casinos seemed immune to the laws of economics.

They weren't, of course; and one law which applies now is that large older industries do not grow as rapidly as young, small ones.

Even in the worst year of the recession, the fiscal year which ended last June 30, statewide casino winnings were up 3.2 percent to $2.7 billion.

But that was a disaster compared to past years. Several casinos went out of business. Taking inflation into account, revenues actually declined in fiscal 1982-83.

Since the end of June, business has been slowly picking up. Nevada had to wait for recovery elsewhere so that people would have money to spend in the casinos.

"I would say Nevada has started into a recovery," said Daniel Lee, gaming research director for Drexel Burnham Lambert, a New York investment banking company. "The numbers pale in comparison to Atlantic City, but then Atlantic City is in a different stage of its growth."

Northern Nevada — Reno and the Lake Tahoe area — recovered first and enjoyed brisk business over the summer. Hotel and motel room tax revenues hit record levels in July, August and September.

"We've done very, very well," said Richard Goeglein, president of Harrah's, which owns hotel-casinos at Lake Tahoe and Reno as well as Atlantic City. "Calendar year '83 is setting all records for us."

Las Vegas has recovered more slowly. But George Swarts, a partner with Lavenoth & Horwath accountants in Las Vegas, predicted a strong final quarter of 1983 for southern Nevada casinos.

Las Vegas, which appeals to a broader market than other Nevada cities, was hurt more by Atlantic City. It also was hurt badly by the devaluation of the Mexican peso, which cut off a lucrative flow of patrons from Mexico and, in some cases, left the casinos saddled with debts.

A 1980 study indicated that 44 percent of the tourists arriving in Las Vegas came by plane, and 5 percent were on "junkets" paid for by the casinos. By 1982, airline visitors had declined to 37 percent and junket visitors to 2 percent.

Swarts predicted an upswing in East Coast tourists to Las Vegas as the initial excitement of Atlantic City wears off — and as the New Jersey resort introduces newcomers to the lure of gambling.

"We're not going to lose any more," he said. "And we may get some back. Some of the people who go to Atlantic City once a month are starting to come to Las Vegas once a year."

Lee predicts future casino growth of 5 to 6 percent a year in Nevada, while Goeglein is slightly more optimistic at 7 to 9 percent. Atlantic City revenues have been growing at a rate of about 20 percent annually, hitting $1.5 billion last fiscal year.

The experts are agreed that Nevada casino operators learned some bitter lessons from the recession.

"I think the industry is becoming more sophisticated, and the obvious lesson is that it is not insulated from the national economy," said Eadington.

Swarts said past recessions have hurt Nevada, but their effects have been masked by the state's constant growth.

"This time we finally got our bubble popped and realized that the leisure time industries, of which we are a part, are very, very susceptible to recession," he said.

Women roundballers to meet other 'Cats

By VIKKI WATSON
Staff Writer

When K-State's women's basketball squad takes the court at Evanston, Ill., Saturday against Northwestern University, it will face what K-State Head Coach Lynn Hickey describes as an extremely aggressive, a pressure defense-oriented squad and "the toughest team we've faced so far."

What all that means is good competition between the No. 7-ranked Wildcats and a Northwestern squad which lost by only one point this season to top-rated University of Southern California, the National Collegiate Athletic Association's defending national champions.

"They're (Northwestern) small, extremely aggressive, and they're young," Hickey said. "They depend on pressure defense and on a perimeter-type of game. (And) they like to run the ball."

According to Hickey, the keys to a Wildcat victory will be both high and low numbers — a low number of turnovers and a high number of rebounds.

"Our weakest part right now is our rebounding, which slows our running game," she said. "We'll really need to control the boards."

Six-foot-1 junior Angie Bonner and 6-foot-3 sophomore Tina Dixon will try to provide a cure to the squad's rebounding ills. Dixon is coming off a team-high 15-rebound performance against Wichita State University Tuesday and will team up with Bonner, K-State's top rebounder last year with a 7.4 average.

To complement the rebounding strength of Bonner and Dixon, the 'Cats will add sophomores Sheronda Jenkins and Cassandra Jones to provide the quickness at the guard position that Northwestern saw little of during its encounter with USC, Hickey said.

"We have good size and good speed," she said. "We have a variety of offensive threats."

These offensive threats were apparent, yet not overly dominant, in the 'Cats' recent 68-53 victory over WSU — a game pitting a young, inexperienced Shocker squad against a highly-regarded K-State team.

"I wasn't real pleased with our performance, but we didn't play as bad as I previously had thought," said Hickey, who substituted freely toward the 15-point victory's end. "Anytime you play an in-state school, they're going to be hyper to play you."

Hickey said the desire to hand the 'Cats their first defeat — such as WSU has shown — puts added pressure on her talented, yet young, squad.

"Everytime we play a game, a team's going to be out to knock us down," Hickey said. "Every game is a lot of pressure."

"(Northwestern) has an opportunity to get themselves in the Top 20," she said. "I'm sure they have a lot of incentive to get after us. It's going to be a good game."

Following this Saturday's road trip, the 'Cats will return to Manhattan for home games against Drake University and Creighton University, Dec. 8 and Dec. 10, respectively.

Staff/Jeff Taylor

Playmaker

Sophomore playmaker Jim Roder, who led K-State in scoring with 20 points in Tuesday's 82-74 victory over Oral Roberts University, will lead the Wildcats as they attempt to capture their second victory of the season against U.S. International Saturday night in Ahearn Field House.

Federal Bureau of Prisons adheres to judge's order

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Federal Bureau of Prisons, adhering to a judge's recommendation, said Thursday that All-Star outfielder Willie Wilson and two other 1983 Kansas City Royals will serve their three-month prison terms in the federal prison at Fort Worth, Texas. The decision follows the recommendation by U.S. Magistrate J. Milton Sullivan that Willie Aikens and Jerry Martin — who no longer are with the Royals — and Wilson should serve their sentences at the Fort Worth Federal Correctional Institution so they can take part in its drug treatment program.

The charges against the players arose from an investigation of drug trafficking in Kansas.

NBA negotiators agree to mediation

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Negotiators for the National Basketball Association agreed Thursday to submit their contract dispute with locked-out referees to federal mediation. Some progress in negotiations was reported, but there was a new dispute over where and when the talks would resume.

The referees' union had suggested mediation last week after talks between the two sides had been stalled for some time.

In Washington, mediator Ed McMahon said he had talked to both sides, but was unable to arrange a meeting.

"I've been trying to get a meeting, but I have not been successful," McMahon said. "The union is ready to meet tomorrow, but it looks like it won't be until early next week. Management is saying it is unable to come to Washington, and they would like to do it in New York."

The contract between the league and the officials expired Sept. 1 and both exhibition and regular-season games have been officiated by substitutes. There has been only sporadic negotiations since the season started.

Originally, the Federal Mediation Service assigned Robert Kyler of Philadelphia to the case, but the NBA refused to accept a mediator from the same city where the referees' counsel, Richie Phillips, has his headquarters.

"We seemed to have made significant progress at a session in New York on Tuesday where their committee and (outgoing Commissioner Larry) O'Brien (and incoming Commissioner David) Stern and three owners on their advisory committee were present for the NBA," Phillips said.

"However, there are several issues which still separate us and they have indicated inflexibility on them. I have indicated a willingness to make necessary compromises on those issues once they abandon their take-it-or-leave-it position. I'm willing to compromise as long as they are."

State officials oust senators for tax views

By The Associated Press

LANSING, Mich. — Leaders of an anti-tax group Thursday hailed the recall of two state senators as "the best thing since the Boston Tea Party" and predicted it would spur a revolt aimed at ousting Gov. James Blanchard and rolling back taxes to 1981 levels.

On Wednesday, Democratic Sen. David Serotkin from Mount Clemens became the second Michigan legislator in eight days to be recalled for backing a 38 percent state income tax increase. It was proposed by the Democratic governor to wipe out a budget deficit estimated at $900 million.

"They (the recalls) are going to help us a lot," said Richard Headlee, unsuccessful Republican candidate for governor last year and an executive committee member of the anti-tax group Voter's Choice.

"It's the best thing that's happened since the Boston Tea Party," he said. "It's healthy."

On Nov. 22, state Sen. Philip Mastin, another Democrat, was ousted for his vote on the increase, which raised the flat-rate tax to 6.35 percent from 4.6 percent. The rate rolls back to 6.1 percent in January.

The two seats will remain empty until special elections early next year, and both men are barred from seeking election to the Senate at that time.

The recalls, the first of state officials in Michigan history, evened the balance between Democrats and Republicans in the Senate at 18-18, with Lt. Gov. Martha Griffiths, a Democrat, able to break ties.

The recalls also have spurred drives to recall Blanchard and two more Detroit-area Democratic legislators — Sen. Patrick McCollough of Dearborn and Rep. David Evans of Mount Clemens.

Blanchard, who took office in January, is Michigan's first Democratic governor in 20 years. His party controls the state House by a 63-47 margin.

Voter's Choice is pushing a proposed constitutional amendment that would roll back state and local taxes to December 1981 levels and require voter approval of increases in fees or taxes by state and local governments.

"Voter's Choice will put a permanent stop to...the taxing and spending," said former GOP state Sen. Jack Welborn of Kalamazoo.

Unresponsive governments can be changed . . .

Druse militiamen blast base, kill 8 Marines

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Druse gunners blasted the U.S. Marine base at the Beirut airport with rockets and artillery shells Sunday night, killing eight Marines and wounding two, a Marine spokesman reported.

Maj. Dennis Brooks said the Marines came under intense fire about 12 hours after Syrian anti-aircraft batteries shot down two U.S. Navy jets that were among 28 warplanes which launched the first American air strike in Lebanon.

The Pentagon said a two-man A-6 and a single-pilot A-7 fighter-bomber were downed when the planes attacked Syrian positions in Lebanon's central mountains about 8 a.m. (1 a.m. EST) in response to earlier attacks on U.S. reconnaissance planes.

One flier was rescued, at least one was captured and Syrian soldiers said a third died of injuries.

U.S. Navy warships opened fire on the Druse positions in the mountains overlooking the Marine base and the thunder from their heavy guns rattled buildings in Beirut.

Brooks said the Druse militiamen began spraying the southern end of the Marine encampment with small arms and 23mm anti-aircraft fire at about 7 p.m. (12 noon EST) and soon "the entire airport perimeter" was being shelled.

The naval gunfire "was the result of heavy, sustained artillery, rocket, small-arms and mortar fire that the Marine positions have been under," Brooks said.

He said the Marines "opened up with everything we have," including 155mm artillery, M-60 tanks, heavy machine guns and small arms.

The shelling of the Marine encampment ended 4½ hours later, Brooks said.

The deaths of the Marines brought to 254 the number of American servicemen killed in Lebanon, including 239 who perished in a suicide truck-bombing of the Marine headquarters on Oct. 23.

A Defense Department spokesman in Washington said names of the latest victims would not be released pending notification of relatives.

About 1,500 Marines are stationed here as part of a multinational peacekeeping force that also includes British, French and Italian troops.

In Washington, White House national security spokesman Robert Sims said, "I know we've had an attack from Druse and probably Shiite positions around the airport at Beirut and it is pretty intense. We have had some casualties and we have responded with tank and naval gunfire."

White House spokeswoman Sheila Dixon said President Reagan had been briefed about the development.

At a black-tie reception in the White House, President Reagan told reporters, "I've just had a first report, no confirmation of it."

He was asked if the United States would retaliate, and said, "Well, as I understand it, we are right now returning fire from our naval artillery."

Secretary of State George P. Shultz declined comment, saying, "I've just had a report there has been shelling and there are casualties."

The White House said Reagan authorized the morning air raid and had vowed to order more strikes if Syrian anti-aircraft batteries continue to fire at American surveillance planes.

"We are going to defend our forces there," Reagan told reporters at the White House. "If our forces are attacked, we will respond."

The air strikes marked the first time U.S. forces in the area were known to have attacked Syrian army positions, bringing the United States into direct military confrontation with the Soviet Union's closest ally in the region.

Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger said the Syrians were believed to be holding two of the fliers shot down Sunday morning. "We are attempting to negotiate their release," Reagan said.

But a Lebanese photographer on assignment for The Associated Press said he saw a captured American at one crash site, as well as another severely injured crewman taken away by Syrian soldiers. The Syrians later told reporters one American died of his injuries.

The Pentagon on Sunday identified the two missing fliers as Lt. Mark A. Lange and Lt. Robert O. Goodman.

Lange, 26, is from Frasier, Mich., and Goodman, 27, is from Portsmouth, N.H.

Lt. Col. Peter Friend, Pentagon spokesman, said, "We have no way of knowing the status of their condition at this time. Only the Syrians can do that."

A Syrian communique mentioned only one pilot held.

The other U.S. planes returned safely to the aircraft carriers USS Independence and USS Kennedy off the Lebanese coast, the Defense Department said.

The Pentagon said its planes dropped a variety of explosives, including conventional 1,000-pound bombs and cluster bombs. It gave no report of the damage caused.

Syrian Foreign Minister Abdul-Halim Khaddam said two Syrians were killed and 10 wounded in the raid. Syria also said it lost one vehicle and an ammunition dump and shot down three American planes.

Weinberger, who spoke to reporters after a meeting with French Defense Minister Charles Hernu, stressed the attack was in no way connected to the Oct. 23 suicide attack on the Marine compound in Beirut that killed 239 American soldiers.

The raid followed by one day an Israeli air assault in the central mountains.

Damascus radio broadcast a statement by Khaddam saying the sequence of the raids "unveils the nature of the joint Israeli-American action (a defense agreement) that was reached during the visit of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir recently to Washington."

Cold fails to deter protest against pro-Khomeini meeting

Despite the snow and cold temperatures, members of the Iranian Student Association demonstrated in front of the University Ramada Inn Saturday. The group was protesting a convention of 800-1,000 pro-Khomeini supporters from around the nation in Manhattan Dec. 26-28.

By KELLY ROBINSON
Staff Writer

Saturday's blowing snow and cold temperatures did not prevent several protesters from the Iranian Student Association from congregating in front of the University Ramada Inn in protest of a pro-Khomeini convention to be held Dec. 26-28 in Manhattan.

The protest, which began about 10:30 a.m., lasted about an hour and a half. Dan Richards, Ramada Inn's assistant manager, said the group had obtained a city permit to stand on the sidewalk at the corner of 17th Street and Anderson Avenue but were not allowed to bring their protest inside.

A statement issued by the association said the "group of 800-1,000 fanatical supporters of the Ayatollah Khomeini, coming to Manhattan from all across the United States, is better known as a group of agents of Khomeini's barbaric regime."

Richards said the association is basically trying to put pressure on area businesses and local residents in order to prevent the pro-Khomeini group from conducting its meetings here.

"That's really the only power they have over the situation," he said.

Richards said the pro-Khomeinis have already been refused use of several local meeting facilities, including the K-State Union, Manhattan High School and the Ramada Inn.

"We just don't have room for a group that size," he said.

The inn has, however, accepted reservations from the group to stay three nights in its facilities.

"We can't really discriminate against them," Richards said. "I guess the way we look at it is that the government lets them in the country, Manhattan lets them live in the community, so to some extent they have already been accepted."

Union, bus line reach tentative settlement

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Union leaders are expected to push hard for ratification of a contract agreement aimed at ending a bitter, month-long strike against Greyhound Lines. But one union official acknowledged "we bit the bullet" on wage concessions.

After two days of make-or-break bargaining, the Amalgamated Transit Union and Greyhound reached a tentative settlement on a new contract, according to federal mediators. A ratification vote before December 20 is planned.

Neither side would comment publicly on details of the pact Sunday.

Union sources acknowledged the agreement contained major concessions, including a 7.8 percent wage cut — the same amount rejected earlier by a union vote — and a commitment by the employees to assume from the company a 4 percent payment into the pension plan.

"We felt that we went as far as we could go," one member of the union's bargaining council said, insisting on anonymity. He added, "We bit the bullet hard on the economic issues" but kept major work rules and won assurances that striking workers would return to their old jobs with seniority intact.

In the meantime, the strike of 12,700 drivers and other employees against the nation's largest intercity bus line continued Sunday, and company officials said they will maintain sharply reduced services with non-strikers and newly trained drivers.

The settlement, aimed at ending a violence-marred strike that has resulted in more than 100 arrests since Nov. 2, was announced Saturday night by federal mediator Kay McMurray after two days of intense bargaining.

But across the country, local union officials and the few remaining pickets predicted resistance to the pact.

"We're probably going to take some losses," said 10-year driver Willie Tiller, a picket in Miami. "But just because the council accepts, it doesn't mean the rank and file will."

In Hartford, Conn., local ATU representative Rich Whitman predicted the contract will be rejected because "the proposed payout is unacceptable."

Violence in media desensitizes public

By MELISSA BRUNE
Collegian Reporter

Movies and television programs are trying to desensitize the public to the tragedy of such violent crimes as rape, according to studies conducted by Edward Donnerstein, a psychologist at the University of Wisconsin, and his colleagues.

Donnerstein spoke on "Sexual Violence in the Media — Toward a Desensitization to Rape" to a group of students and faculty Thursday in Denison Hall in a colloquium sponsored by the Department of Psychology and the Graduate School Guest Scholar Program.

He explained that he and his colleagues are involved in efforts to research the effects of long-term exposure to mass media violence. Much of the material presented Thursday was new research in the field, he said.

The five topics he discussed were:

- Is there sexual violence in the mass media?

- Effects on sexual arousal, rape-related attitudes, and aggression toward women.

- Relative contribution of sexual and violent content.

- Effects of massive, long-term exposure to sexual violence (two weeks).

- Where do we go from here?

To cite an example of the answer to his first question, which he said was obviously "yes," Donnerstein showed an old advertisement for a Rolling Stones album. The ad

Education may lessen effects

depicted a woman tied to a chair, with bruises covering her body. It read, "I'm 'Black and Blue' from The Rolling Stones."

Donnerstein said the ad implies that the woman loves bondage. He said this is not necessarily the case in reality.

"Quite often the victims don't get turned on," he said.

Donnerstein showed another example of sexual violence in which a nude woman, her body smeared with blood, had her nipple torn by a pair of clippers.

"She is invariably turned on," he quipped.

He said he showed the slide because it represents some of the extremes of violence in the media. Donnerstein said he took the photo from a magazine which he said is available over the counter.

Donnerstein described such examples as this as aggressive pornography — sexual exposure which contains aggression.

While discussing the effects of aggressive pornography on individuals, Donnerstein referred to results of studies done by Neil Malamuth of the University of California Los Angeles.

Through charts and graphs, Donnerstein showed a study done by Malamuth in which men questioned responded that 25 percent of the women they know would enjoy being raped and 30 percent would enjoy being forced to have sexual intercourse. These responses were tabulated after the men had seen a rape depiction in which there was a positive outcome, the victim became aroused by the use of force.

The study also showed that if individuals are exposed to images in which there is a positive outcome, 50 to 55 percent of the men asked say they are willing to commit rape if they are guaranteed not to be caught.

Malamuth writes, "To the extent that people perceive that they are sexually aroused by violence, they may infer that they are capable of and would be sexually aroused by rape." He added, "This may be based on experience with violent pornography, rather than actual behavior they had previously engaged in."

After two years of studies, Malamuth established that arousal can occur from viewing these images if a positive outcome to aggressive pornography is shown.

Donnerstein explained some of the new research he is conducting. Donnerstein said studies he is conducting are similar to those of Malamuth, but he and his colleagues have tried to move away from predisposed individuals. Subjects were screened before the testing to choose "ultra-normal individuals."

Donnerstein showed a four-minute clip from "Toolbox Murders," in which a woman was shown preparing for and taking a bath. He said movies such as this invariably show women in some type of sexual juxtaposition with the violence occurring in the movie. In this clip, the young woman was killed as she ran through her house nude.

Subjects showed, through repeated long-term exposure to movies including "Toolbox Murders," that they were decreasingly upset and bothered by watching violence, including rape and murder.

After watching aggressively pornographic movies for five days in a row, subjects' responses to questions including amount of violence seen, number of rapes seen, disturbance caused by the violence, were consistently lower. By the fifth day of watching the movies, subjects saw the lowest amount of violence, and most were able to watch violent scenes without turning away or being upset.

Donnerstein said this data clearly shows that the public is being desensitized to the violence in the mass media.

He said the effects of violence on the public can be mitigated, but he said education is the answer to the issue.

"Those who are most susceptible are 18 and under. There isn't any legal way to study those who are 18 and under."

Test to predict attitudes, behavior of adolescents

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Psychological tests given in junior high school can predict which youngsters will smoke cigarettes, drink liquor or use marijuana when they get a few years older, researchers say. The tests measure the children's attitudes toward authority and good behavior. The most rebellious youngsters get the lowest scores. And the lower the score, the researchers say, the more likely the child is to drink, smoke cigarettes and puff pot.

The research, published recently in the journal Contemporary Drug Problems, is among the first results of a major 14-year study of the behavior of school children.

Researchers who administer the tests come up with a "socialization" score for each child.

"Where you are at an early age on the scale of socialization predicts with surprising accuracy where you will be three years later in your use of drugs in high school," said Dr. Gene M. Smith of Massachusetts General Hospital. "This same scale also differentiates those who will become users of the legal drugs — cigarettes and alcohol — from those who will not."

Smith said the test might be used to spot susceptible children so they can be counseled against drugs before they start using them.

In 1969, the researchers tested 1,474 junior high school pupils in four middle-class Boston suburbs. Followup studies were conducted three years later and again in 1980 when the young people had reached their 20s.

Youngsters with low scores described themselves on the tests as being willing to lie, cheat, hurt others, break rules and disobey their parents.

The adolescents also rated all the other pupils in their homerooms. The ones with low scores were described by their classmates as being disobedient, rebellious, impulsive, irresponsible, untrustworthy, disorganized, insensitive and lacking in motivation.

Youngsters with the kinds of personalities that adults like best scored highest on the tests. They did not smoke, drink or use marijuana in junior high, and they still shunned these things when they were in high school three years later.

Those who scored a bit lower dabbled with alcohol and cigarettes in high school but did not try pot.

When scores were still lower, the youngsters became infrequent users of marijuana in high school.

Union to extend hours

By The Collegian Staff

The Union will extend its hours beginning today to help students find study places during dead week and finals week.

Today through Dec. 15 the Stateloom will be open until 11:30 p.m., including the weekend. The general building area, which includes the ground, first and second floors, will remain open until midnight.

Jack Connaughton, Union assistant director, said the hours were expanded to accommodate students as they prepare for final exams.

The Union stayed open late last semester during dead and finals weeks for the first time.

"It was so well received last semester we decided to do it again," Connaughton said.

Collegian editor resigns

Paul Hanson resigned effective Sunday from his job as editor of the Collegian for personal reasons. Dee Anne Thomas, news editor and spring semester editor, will assume responsibility as editor. The Collegian will be published through Friday of this week.

Pornography films to educate viewers

By KRISTI NELSON
Collegian Reporter

A film to be shown next semester is expected to draw campus interest and discussion of pornography.

"Not a Love Story," a documentary about pornography, will be presented by the Union Program Council Kaleidoscope Committee, Women's Resource Center, Women Against Rape, the Crisis Center and Coalition for Human Rights.

The documentary was released two years ago by the National Film Board (NFB) of Canada.

A presentation and discussion session will follow each of the film's three showings in mid-February.

"The film will have a very emotional impact on audiences. The film deals with not only the existence of pornography, but why it exists," said Andrew Mohr, UPC Kaleidoscope chairman and sophomore in political science.

"The movie comes at a very appropriate time with the rising concern for rape in this community. It teaches how rape can be related to pornography," he said.

"The movie is not a film for thrill-seekers, because of the pornography to be shown. This is a very educational film for anyone who sees it," Mohr said.

Clippings and reading material about pornography are available at the Women's Resource Center.

Sue Rieger, assistant director of the resource center, said a study done by Women Against Violence in Pornography and Media revealed a steady increase in the production of pornography. In 1953, no pornography magazines were published, but by 1977, 40 different magazines existed. In Los Angeles, pornography film sales earned $15 million in 1959 and $85 million in 1976.

Rieger said the sexual revolution is allowing the pornography industry to flourish.

"I don't like censorship, but I feel like most pornography gives a distorted image of sexuality," she said.

"I have visited with people who have seen it (the film) and they said it was an overwhelming emotional experience," Rieger said. "Some said it was the best film they had ever seen."

"The film will be an excellent lead-in to discussions about how pornography affects men and women," Rieger added.

"Not a Love Story" is described by the NFB as a thought-provoking, emotional chronicle of two women — a filmmaker and a Montreal stripper. Together they explore the world of peep shows, strip joints and sex supermarkets. Although their backgrounds are different, both are motivated by a desire to know more about pornography.

The women explore why pornography exists, what forms it takes and how it affects relationships between men and women.

The NFB said that the film does not promote pornography, but instead makes it clear that pornography is widespread and growing.

Pornographic images shown in the film are not different from those available either legally or illegally across the country, the NFB said. Because annual sales of pornographic materials exceed $5 billion, it is clear that pornography is no longer an isolated phenomenon, but a pervasive part of our culture, the NFB said.

The film features frank interviews with people who earn their living in pornography, including Suze Randall, a photographer for "Hustler" magazine; David Wells, publisher of five of Canada's most profitable "men's entertainment" magazines and various strippers and performers.

The film was produced by Studio D of the NFB's English Production Branch, the only publicly-funded women's film unit in the world.

Although the studio includes male filmmakers, its main objective is to encourage women to focus on social issues and to act as a catalyst for social change through the medium of film, the NFB said.

Shuttle crew talks with king, makes repairs

By The Associated Press

SPACE CENTER, Houston — After talking by radio to the king of Jordan, a "happy bunch" of handyman astronauts used a makeshift darkroom inside a bedroll to fix a jammed camera Sunday, then repaired and fired up a twice-broken furnace.

Spacelab scientist Owen Garriott reached fellow ham radio buff King Hussein, who told him, "We're very, very, proud of you, and we share this pride with all the people of America, all the people of the world."

Bob Parker and Ulf Merbold of the Red Team — one astronaut shift — and Garriott and Byron Lichtenberg of the Blue Team got out tools and instructions Sunday to repair a series of broken experiments aboard their orbiting Spacelab. Then they charged on with the non-stop experimentation they have kept up since Spacelab was launched with space shuttle Columbia last Monday.

Mission commander John Young and pilot Brewster Shaw worked in the cockpit of Columbia and made little comment to the ground.

The repairs boosted morale aboard Spacelab and Rick Chappel, mission scientist here, said, "They're a happy bunch up there right now."

Parker took a broken mapping camera to bed with him and took apart the complex instrument inside the light-proof confines of a bedroll.

Working by touch alone, the astronaut discovered that a cassette had jammed. He snipped the film, rethreaded it onto the magazine and emerged with a working camera.

Merbold, meanwhile, rerouted a power wire to go around a short circuit that had idled two materials science furnaces. He isolated a short circuit and permanently disabled one device, but he restored power to a "mirror heating" device which uses light amplified by mirrors to melt crystals.

When the astronauts later turned on the mirror heater, however, it shut down automatically. This time the problem was a fouled cooling system.

Lichtenberg reprogrammed a computer and apparently fixed it.

The mirror heater was put to work on a sample of silicate. Officials said no attempt would be made to repair the other furnace, which failed after completing work on all but three of 13 planned samples.

Mission scientist Kari Knopp had high praise for the astronauts' skills as repairmen.

Officials at the Johnson Space Center announced Saturday that the Spacelab mission would be extended by a day, weather permitting, to give the astronauts a full 10 days in orbit. The landing would be at 11:01 a.m. EST Thursday at Edwards Air Force Base, Calif.

Flight director Charles Lewis said the final decision for an extension will not be made until weather forecasts are received late tonight or early Tuesday.

Presidential hopefuls react to Mideast confrontation

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Former Sen. George McGovern on Sunday reacted to U.S. air strikes in Lebanon and the killing of eight more U.S. Marines in Beirut by saying that "step by step the United States is approaching war with Syria."

Seeking the Democratic nomination for president, McGovern said that "Ronald Reagan is compounding his mistakes in Lebanon rather than facing his original mistake of assigning Marines to a sitting-duck role at the Beirut Airport. He has virtually consigned our Marines as hostages of the Arab-Israeli conflict. ... Those who have survived should be brought home immediately before they too fall victim to President Reagan's mishandling of American policy in that region."

McGovern first called for bringing the Marines home last September. Reacting also to the attacks Sunday by U.S. planes on Syrian positions, the former Democratic senator said that the "(U.S. Marine) fatality list will grow as strikes and counter-strikes escalate. Step by step, the United States is approaching war with Syria."

Another candidate seeking the Democratic presidential nomination, Sen. John Glenn of Ohio, said the U.S. government "should exercise the utmost caution and measure our response to this extremely dangerous situation very carefully," adding that he does not favor withdrawing U.S. Marines "at this time or under these circumstances."

We Will Buy Your Books?

Question: How does the Union Bookstore determine how much your books are worth when you sell them back?

Answer: If the Bookstore has notification from the instructor that the books are to be re-adopted for use the next semester, and if the Bookstore does not already have a sufficient stock on hand, then you will be offered 60% of the publisher's current list price.

For example: if a book sells for $10 new and it meets the requirements noted above, the book would be bought from you for $6.

If the Bookstore has not received notice that the book will be used again, or if it already has a sufficient stock on hand, the book would be worth the current wholesale price as indicated by one of the nation's largest jobbers of used textbooks.

If you have any questions about the price being paid for a textbook, the buyer will be happy to answer any questions which you may have regarding the price paid.

Question: Is 60% the usual price paid for textbooks around the country?

Answer: Definitely not. Most stores in the United States pay only 50% for books being used again. The Union Bookstore is one of the few stores which pays 60%. And remember, we pay cash. You don't have to take your money out in trade.

Question: What about paperbacks? Does the 60% policy apply to them too?

Answer: Yes. The Union Bookstore does not penalize you on paperbacks. If they are being used again, and if the bookstore needs them, you will receive 60% of the publisher's list price.

Question: If the publisher's price has gone up since I bought my books, will I receive the benefit of that price increase?

Answer: Yes. For instance, if you bought your book for $9 and the publisher's list price is now $10, you will get $6, not $5.40.

De-ice the sidewalks

In light of the recent snows in Manhattan, University Facilities should be praised for its snow-removal efforts. Anyone walking on campus does not have to be concerned about trekking through layers of snow on sidewalks to get to classes.

However, it is still essential to wear some sort of winter boots on campus. Otherwise, you are liable to slide right by your classroom, unless, of course, you fall on the way. The snow has been replaced with a thin sheet of ice from the rain Saturday and snow-removal equipment can do nothing to lessen this hazard.

Consider the reception at President Acker's house Sunday for December graduates. Not many people choose to don hiking boots when wearing a suit or dress, and the average dress shoe gets very little traction. Taking into account the slight inclines which surround Acker's house, there were some people who, taking the sidewalk a bit too uncautiously, found themselves going down the walk in a different fashion than they had intended.

The hazards of winter are understood by those who have grown up with snow and quickly learned by those who have come to K-State from areas which do not have winters similar to those in the central plains region of the United States. Precautions should be taken by all pedestrians to ensure that no injuries are sustained because of the icy walks.

Granted, the University has no machinery which is capable of the large-scale removal of the coating of ice from the sidewalks. But the University must still do something to make the campus walkways safe for students, faculty and staff. This will probably require spreading salt or sand on the walk. If the ice cannot be removed, there must at least be something done to change the texture of the ice, as sand does.

We are pleased with the job University Facilities does in clearing the snow from the walks. One can see the employees out shoveling and driving snow-thrusters throughout the weekend. The snow-removal equipment is adequate and the workers do their jobs well. But something must be done to fight the ice hazard to make the winter safer for all those on campus.

Starting to write, part 2

(Author's Note: This is the second of two columns on what caused me to become a writer. The first column appeared in last Friday's Collegian.)

In 1937, when John J. Fagan gave as the first assignment to his English class at Lewistown High School in Pennsylvania the writing of a theme titled "My Life," I was challenged. Although only 15 years old, I felt I had already had quite a life. In a sense, Mr. Fagan's giving of that assignment was the first time I had ever been asked to activate my memory.

I went home to the farmhouse next to the Juniata River in north-central Pennsylvania, where we lived, and for the following three nights I wrote about my life to that point.

This assignment had been given to us on Tuesday, being due on Friday. I wrote with soft-leaded pencil on an old-fashioned school tablet with ruled paper (one which had a drawing of the head of an Indian chief on its cover). I sat at the kitchen table, writing by the light of a kerosene lamp. Sounds corny. But there it is.

I remembered the years we had lived in California before moving to Pennsylvania; I brought back the three years we had lived in Oklahoma; and I recalled the year we had lived in Canada and the first time I had ever seen snow. I wrote about the half-dozen trips we had made by that time across the United States, including the long 90-day revival tour of my father to Northwest Canada and back in the summer of 1930, during which time I had heard him preach more than 100 sermons.

I described the 10-week trip from Africa through England and Scotland on our way to my grandfather's home in Canada. I remembered from that trip the majesty of the mountain that comprised the island of Tenerife in the Canary Islands.

And, finally, I went back in my mind and writing to the Matopo Hills in Africa where I had spent the first seven years of my life. And I went back to remembering Dalton Brewer and the various things I had learned from him.

For three nights I wrote about all these things.

I wrote 53 pages. Suddenly, it strikes me that the number of pages I wrote then when I was a boy 15 years old was the same number as the years my father had lived until that time! I can't help but wonder if there wasn't some deep subliminal ancestral consciousness at work in me that caused me to stop writing after 53 pages!

On Friday, Mr. Fagan asked us to give him our themes as we left the classroom. As I handed him my 53 pages, he paused in the routine of collection, flopped my sheaf up and down a few times, but said nothing.

The next Monday, just before the end of his class, he suddenly barked, "Climenhaga, I want to see you after school."

I murmured something about missing my bus if I stayed after school. The Lewistown school district had an arrangement with the public bus company which served the Lewistown-Granville run for students from Granville to ride any of its hourly scheduled buses.

Mr. Fagan said, "I'll take you up to the town square to catch your next bus."

"My parents will worry if I don't get home on time."

"I'll telephone your parents and explain the situation to them."

"We don't have a phone!"

He turned away.

Just as quickly, he turned back. "Climenhaga," he almost shouted at me, "didn't you think 53 pages was a lot to write?"

I was young and I was brash. I believe it is a brashness common to 15-year-olds — particularly 15-year-old boys. It's a brashness born out of insecurity. Whatever the cause of my brashness, I retorted, "No! I could have written 530 pages if I had had more time!"

The bell rang and the class ended. The home-room period in Lewistown High School was the last period of the day. Mr. Fagan came into the room 10 or 15 minutes before its end on that day, talked briefly to my home-room teacher, then motioned for me to come forward. We went into the hallway.

"Climenhaga," he growled at me, as he closed the door, "I'm going to talk to you now before I change my mind."

I waited. Then he said that he had a bargain for me. If I wanted to do it — that I could write one theme each week for him, using anything I wanted to for my subjects. He asked me if I liked to read. I told him I did. Then he said I could write one book report for him each week — and he would choose the books. That if I did these two things, I would not have to do any of the work that the rest of the class would do.

"Well, what about it?" he asked, when he was finished.

I said, "Yes, I'll do that."

I didn't realize at the time that Mr. Fagan actually was giving me a lot more to do than the rest of the class. It really would have been easier and less time-consuming for me to have done what they were required to do. Nor, for that matter, did I understand that he was taking on himself a lot more work than was called for in his contract. It would have been easier and a lot less time-consuming for him not to have made the offer.

What I did know was that I was tremendously excited at the plan. That year was unquestionably one of the most challenging and provocative years I ever spent in school.

And I believe it was that year which caused me to become a writer.

Mr. Fagan is now dead. After I left Lewistown in 1938, I went back several times to visit him. All that, however, is another story.

In many regards, I believe I am still writing those themes each week for Mr. Fagan. And I am still reading a lot of books.

Good luck, December grads

Graduate: a recipient of an academic degree or diploma.

Graduation: a commencement ceremony.

December Graduate: a recipient of an academic degree or diploma.

December Graduation: nothing.

Last year, 753 undergraduate students and 165 graduate students finished their respective degrees and entered "the real world."

There were no caps and gowns and no graduation ceremony immediately after these graduates finished college. Next month, there will still be no graduation program for the fall of 1983 graduates. They can however, return in May to walk across a stage and perhaps for the first time, shake hands with the University's president.

Some do return. Many can't.

However, in December of 1984, perhaps the December graduates WILL have their own ceremony. The University Commencement Committee, the student body president and the Student Senate Academic Affairs Committee are checking out the possibilities of having some sort of December activity for December graduates. All three are in favor of "something" being done to give honor to mid-year graduates. The details, however need to be worked through.

December graduates did however, get to party at Duane's house. (I think you can call University President "Duane" once you earned your degree.) He and Shirley had all 900 December "grads" over for a little reception at his place Dec. 4.

Being a December graduate means that you've done something different. Rather than attending school the traditional four years, you have either sat out awhile, taken heavy loads and finished early, or have gone an extra amount.

But after December, for nearly 900 students, college will be a memory. K-State will be a memory. They have been through all the general requirements, the not-so-general requirements, and the not-required requirements of higher education.

So then what? In December they're students; in January they're alumni. They get a job (good luck) and they become responsible — isn't that how it goes?

And what's the economic and job market outlook for these graduates?

According to a report by the Scientific Manpower Commission in Washington, the job market for recent engineering grads has shrunk by half. Starting salaries given to the grads who do get jobs have leveled off or declined.

The report stated that job offers as well as salaries were down for chemistry, agriculture, and other physical and earth science majors. But salaries increased for math, biology, and computer science majors.

According to a report by the College Placement Council Inc., "there's good news and bad news."

The good news, they say, is that "employers indicate they expect demand for new college graduates to pick up in 1984. Across the board, in all four curricular areas, at each degree level, increases in hiring are being anticipated."

The bad news, they added, is that "in addition to the 443 employers who provided the above information, another 74 could furnish only partial data or no data at all because their plans were so uncertain. Many are still sifting through the aftermath of massive layoffs and reorganizations."

Bruce Laughlin, director of Career Planning and Placement Center, said "there is a certain amount of optimism," for December graduates.

Laughlin said that the fall graduates will have an advantage and a disadvantage.

The advantage, he said, is that "most of the campus interviews take place in the fall. A student graduating in December is more apt to interview in the fall."

The disadvantage, he added, is that we're "coming out of a recession and although the demands for graduates are increasing, the employers' plans are so unsure that they may wait until spring."

But all in all, whether it be good news or bad news, whether there is an advantage or a disadvantage, if there is a graduation ceremony or no ceremony at all, it all comes down to the individual. To use what's been learned from "the college experience." To apply the knowledge gained through the higher education received. And to boldly face what every graduate has faced before: "life after college."

To the 900 December graduates — congratulations and good luck.

Remembering the victims of society

Editor,
Hope I die before I get old

— The Who

My Generation

Last Saturday, Dec. 3, was the fourth anniversary of the Who concert in Cincinnati, Ohio. Before the concert even started 11 people had died.

There was no cause, no reason for death other than lack of common sense and respect.

But that event is passed. No blame can be laid, nor should any be laid. It won't bring back the dead. Some of the reactions to the event were positive. The candlelight service and the banning of festival (general) seating in Cincinnati, for instance. But how many people today know this event even happened? Certainly KSDB and the Collegian don't know or don't care.

To learn from our mistakes we must remember them, and to pay tribute to the human beings who were hurt by those mistakes we must remember them. Rock'n'roll (pure rock'n'roll, not punk rock or new wave), more than any other kind of music, changed the way people thought over the past three decades. It didn't give us an escape from the problems around us. It drove them home.

But even as the artists made us aware of our troubles, angered us over them, those troubles were killing them. All of the people who have died because of the "evils of society" not only in the rock world, but particularly in the rock world, need to be remembered. John Lennon, Elvis Presley, Jim Morrison, Keith Moon, Jimi Hendrix and the many others who "died from our sins."

Where are today's tributes to the fallen stars of yesterday? If we can't honor them, let's at least not forget them.

Consultant gives wardrobe advice; identifies flattering clothing colors

By MATT MCMILLEN
Collegian Reporter

People almost always look at others and notice what they are wearing — how their clothes fit, whether they are in style, and even the colors they are wearing. But the colors one wears are much more important than most people realize, said Bonnie Hansen, a professional color analyst with Beauty for All Seasons.

Hansen has been working with color for 17 years.

"People glance at us and in an instant, even without knowing it, make judgments about our dependability, friendliness, profession, mood, competence, intelligence, age and health. Research has proven that our colors, our suits, ties and accessories communicate strong persuasive messages about us," states a card in Hansen's office.

Hansen also has taught classes for University for Man.

"We had to make four classes out of what was supposed to be one because there was so much interest," she said.

"What you see first and react to is color. It enters the photo-receptors of your eyes and affects your central nervous system. It happens involuntarily," Hansen said.

"It is to your best advantage to be in your best colors," she said. "They bring positive reactions from other people around you."

Hansen said each person has either warm or cool skin undertones. "Cool-skinned people are more toward winter and summer colors with blue undertones," Hansen said. "Warm-skinned people have golden undertones — colors of autumn and spring."

Hansen helps students determine what colors are best for them so they can invest in a complimentary wardrobe.

"When you become aware of your best colors, it makes a big difference on how your clothes look on you," Hansen said. "We (Beauty for All Seasons) call this your personality expression."

In a session for men, Hansen discusses color draping, dressing for success, personality expression, ties, trousers, suits and skin care.

"Your tie is the most authoritative statement your clothes can make," Hansen said. "For example, a polka dot tie is considered to be authoritative."

"The fit of your clothes — even the length of your pants — all fit into your image," she said.

"Your accessories, such as a briefcase, are also important," she said.

Hansen said women should place emphasis more on cosmetics.

"Cosmetics (for women) is very important," she said. "It has got to be in harmony with your skin."

Hansen uses facial ovals to determine what colors help the hair, eyes and skin to blend correctly. The student puts her face through a colored sheet and it is easier to see what colors are best.

"Your hair color is important, but the skin is still the most important aspect," Hansen said. "Even if your hair goes gray, your skin undertones still stay the same."

When the session is over, the student receives a packet that shows what colors are most complimentary and a booklet about clothing.

"The students can take the color packets shopping with them and from there they can start to build a wardrobe," Hansen said. "The student can usually have about 75 colors to work with."

Hansen said there have been many studies on color, especially by the American Institute of Biosocial Research in Takoma, Wash.

"Colors do a lot of things," she said. "Doctors' offices are painted in colors that make you feel relaxed and restaurants are painted in colors to make you hungry."

Miami nuclear attack survival shop opens

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — "The Day After," a television movie about a fictitious nuclear bombing, has prompted one Miamian to open a new business — a shop offering all the latest in supplies for those who want to make it through a nuclear attack.

Sergio Rayneri's Survive America store is stocked with freeze-dried food, protective suits and blueprints for bomb shelters. On order are inexpensive radioactivity detectors, nuclear survival manuals and lightweight thermal tents.

"We're not predicting nuclear war, God forbid, but people should be prepared," said Rayneri. "Once the alert is sounded, those who have shelters and supplies might be able to survive. As to what comes afterward, who knows?"

"The Day After," broadcast by ABC two weeks ago, showed what could happen in Lawrence, if there were a nuclear strike on Kansas City 35 miles away. Many predicted the widely watched film would make people more concerned about arms control — and the possibility of their use.

Rayneri, who set up shop at a northwestern Miami warehouse, said his store isn't aimed only at survival in event of a nuclear attack.

"There are other things closer to home," he said. "Just a simple thing like getting groceries during a riot or during a truckers strike. If you have supplies stored, you don't have to fight the crowds."

Dietetic licensure may ensure authenticity of 'nutritionists'

By JANET HELM
Contributing Writer and MICHELE SAUER
Staff Writer

Anyone can call himself a nutritionist. Without licensing laws to monitor the profession, the title "nutritionist" is not legally protected.

Allene G. Vaden, professor in dietetics and institutional management, is leading the movement in Kansas to license dietitians. As chairman of the Kansas Dietetic Association Credentialing Committee, Vaden is overseeing the application process for dietetic licensure.

"If we are successful in achieving licensure, for a person to call himself a nutritionist or dietitian (and not meet the specified qualifications) or to do tasks that are covered within the scope of practice would be a violation of the law," Vaden said.

Without dietetic licensure, the public cannot be assured the individual who advertises as a nutritional consultant has received the proper training and preparation to fulfill that role, she said.

Registered dietitians (R.D.) must meet educational and training requirements outlined by The American Dietetic Association and must pass a registration examination. But because the profession is controlled by ADA, a private, non-governmental association, laws do not protect the use of the title "dietitian."

In the Manhattan Yellow Pages, the Diet Center is listed under the subheading "dietitians," although the counselors there are not members of ADA.

When asked if she is a dietitian, Bonnie Hansen, Diet Center counselor, said, "No, I'm a nutritionist. I have a Ph.D. in nutrition. It's from California, from Donsbach University in Huntington Beach."

Hansen said she decided to seek private training because "credibility sometimes in this city is linked to having some sort of degree." She said she needed an external degree program because she could not get away to attend on campus.

Hansen received her doctorate from Donsbach in 1982 and has worked eight years as a diet counselor for the Diet Center.

J.R. Cortner, Manhattan chiropractor, advertises as a nutritional consultant and also is a nutrition graduate of Donsbach University.

"I've studied nutrition...with the best," Cortner said. Anyone who takes a two-hour course somewhere can say he's a nutritionist, he said, but "they don't know nutrition from sour apples. I'm a nutritionist. I got a Ph.D. degree in nutrition from Donsbach."

Donsbach University is an unaccredited correspondence school. It is a candidate for accreditation by the National Non-traditional Schools and Colleges in Denver, which is recognized by the state of California, Kurt Donsbach, president of the university, said.

Vaden, past board member of the Council on Postsecondary Accreditation, said the Denver agency is not recognized by COPA, the national group that recognizes accrediting bodies and determines that they meet standards of good practice in accreditation.

The university was founded by Donsbach, chiropractor and author of "Preventive Organic Medicine." He has a doctorate in nutrition from Union University, a correspondence school in California. He also is a naturopath — a practitioner providing natural treatments, including nutritional therapy.

"We have a standard curriculum that has been submitted to the Department of Education of the state of California," Donsbach said. The average student at the university earns a bachelor's degree in 24 to 36 months. The cost of the university's programs range from $2,495 for only a bachelor's degree to $5,495 for a bachelor's, master's and doctorate degree.

The only requirement to enroll in the university is a high-school diploma. Students are assigned a counselor, who they can call toll free as often as they wish, Donsbach said. Students mail in completed assignments, which are graded by one of the university's 50 staff members.

"We're a home-study school," Donsbach said. We have more than 72 two-day seminars every year around the United States. We feel we're the best nutrition home-study group." The university offers courses in diet and disease, pediatric nutrition, psycho-nutrition and health care management.

According to the book "Nutrition Cultism" by lawyer and physician Victor Herbert, Donsbach has two criminal convictions in connection with nutrition frauds in California. He was charged with "prescribing vitamins, minerals and herbs as treatment for serious diseases," Herbert wrote.

"In 1968, I was convicted of practicing medicine without a license," Donsbach said. "It was a misdemeanor and I never served any jail time. A law change in 1978 made it legal for nutritional consultants to do everything except major surgery and prescribing triple X drugs. We can prescribe antibiotics, do obstetrics and give injections."

"As far as I am aware, there is no such law on the books in California that allows a nutritionist to give injections and prescribe antibiotics," said Maggi Reetz, consumer services representative for the San Mateo office of the California Board of Medical Quality Assurance.

"The injection of matters into a human body is a very dangerous procedure," another BMQA spokesperson at the Sacramento, Calif., office, said. "It constitutes the practice of medicine." Without some authorization by state legislation via licensure a person cannot penetrate the body by giving injections, he said.

California law allows university degrees to be given in three categories: "accredited," "approved" and "authorized." Authorized universities, which include mail-order universities, do not have a quality standard, Herbert said.

The curriculum summary for Donsbach University does make reference to its status, and states, "If only a traditional accredited program will fit your perceived needs, then your degree objectives may not be met at Donsbach University."

Other schools, such as the Nutritionists Institute of America in Kansas City, Mo., offer certificates of nutrition rather than academic degrees by mail.

According to a brochure from the institute, the correspondence program offers certificates for assistant, associate and professional nutritionists. The programs require three to 12 months to complete and range in price from $395 to $1,125. Curricula include diet therapy, psycho-nutrition and megavitamin therapy. The lessons are mailed from Kansas City to the student, and examinations may be taken by telephone.

"A Ph.D. has so much prestige associated with it that people covet it," said Robert Kruh, dean of K-State's Graduate School. "Human beings responding to various behavioral incentives would like to see some easy way to get that attractive goal."

"People who hold degrees from dubious operations will be caught short when it comes time for employment because employers are generally very wary, very knowledgeable about sources of degrees," Kruh said.

However, many of these individuals with degrees from unaccredited or home-study schools are self-employed, working as private nutritionists.

"The general public won't have that kind of awareness, won't be that probing or demanding," Kruh said. "Many consumers would be embarrassed to ask about a person's credentials."

Correspondence-school graduates "wouldn't have a prayer" of getting into K-State's Graduate School, Kruh said. "We insist that people have degrees from accredited schools."

The Department of Foods and Nutrition at K-State requires entering graduate students to have a bachelor's degree from an accredited institution. A minimum of 90 semester hours is required for a doctorate degree. This includes a minimum of 30 hours for the dissertation and at least one year in residence. Laboratory work is required for many courses.

An offshoot of Donsbach University, the International Academy of Nutritional Consultants, is described by its literature as a professional association "dedicated to maintaining ethical standards in nutritional and dietary consulting." The only membership requirement, however, is to pay the entry fee.

In the October 1983 issue of the "ACSH (American Council on Science and Health) News and Views," Herbert said his cat has become a member of the academy.

"Although your initial reaction would be to laugh at this situation, it is very serious," Grunewald said. "It illustrates the ease with which individuals are able to obtain these diplomas and certificates."

"This is unfortunate because the public trusts individuals with credentials, even though these credentials may not be reliable," Grunewald said. "The real harm may result if an individual with health problems receives an incorrect diagnosis from an unqualified 'nutritionist.'"

Often prescribed diet supplements may provide a false sense of security so that a person delays seeing a physician who is qualified to evaluate his health status, she said.

Snow pig

In an effort to build a non-traditional snowman, Terry Hesterman, freshman in civil engineering, Bruce Berggren, junior in mechanical engineering, and Alan Collins, junior in engineering technology, put the final touches on a snow pig they dubbed "Pink Floyd." The trio built the pig next to their house on Manhattan Avenue Sunday night.

Physician analyzes value of presidents' health

By The Associated Press

CHICAGO — When a president has even a minor health problem these days, it's front-page news. His aides hastily call a press conference and give out a multitude of facts, but it was not always so, says Dr. William M. Lukash, official White House physician to Presidents Nixon, Ford and Carter.

From the earliest days of the Republic until relatively recently, the state of the president's health was often veiled in vagueness, if not downright secrecy, Lukash writes in the new 1984 "Medical and Health Annual."

Most people know about George Washington's wooden dentures. Not so well known is the fact that he, as well as Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson, suffered from a variety of chronic disorders including recurrent bouts of malaria.

As the presidency grew in importance, presidential health gradually became a carefully guarded secret, Lukash notes.

In 1893, when Grover Cleveland's doctors found that he had a cancerous growth in his mouth, the public was not informed, Lukash reports. Although Cleveland twice underwent secret surgery in which a part of his upper left jaw was removed and replaced with a vulcanized rubber prosthesis, few learned about it.

Woodrow Wilson's grave illness was also shielded from the public, writes Lukash. In 1919, worn out by the prolonged and rancorous peace negotiations in France and the battle for American entry in the League of Nations, Wilson suffered two strokes that incapacitated him for the rest of his life.

For two years, Wilson lived as an invalid and reclusive in the White House. The facts about his health were known only by his physician, one or two close aides, and his wife who, also unknown to the public, assumed many of the president's executive duties.

A similar shroud of secrecy fell over the deteriorating health of Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1944, because of his determination to seek a fourth term and a general concern about national security in time of war, Lukash explains.

Although it was later learned Roosevelt was suffering from hypertension and heart failure and may even have had cancer, his physician stated openly that the president's health was excellent.

"The secrecy surrounding his final illness was so complete that public reaction to his death in 1945 was a mixture of shock and disbelief," Lukash writes.

Since the time of John F. Kennedy, presidents have been subjected to rigorous diet and exercise regimens to help them handle the stress that goes with the office, Lukash points out. Kennedy, an athlete at college, made physical fitness a hallmark of his abbreviated term.

"Each president also has techniques for relaxation that help him unwind and regenerate his energy to meet the heavy responsibilities of office," writes Lukash.

Soviets blame fighting on U.S., Israeli talks

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Radio Moscow blamed agreements reached between the United States and Israel in Washington last week for the downing of two U.S. Navy warplanes during air raids over Lebanon Sunday.

It reported the planes were shot down over Syrian-controlled territory in Lebanon and said that "the day before Israeli aircraft struck at national-patriotic forces" in territory also controlled by Syrian forces.

"Observers connect the escalation of the fighting by the United States and Israel in Lebanon with the new strategic agreements reached during the visit to Washington" of Israeli Premier Yitzhak Shamir, the broadcast said.

The official news agency Tass reported that "American fighter-bombers" bombed Syrian positions and quoted the Syrian news agency SANA as saying three were shot down and "one pilot was taken prisoner."

It made no comment on the U.S. action.

Shamir and President Reagan agreed last Tuesday to set up a military commission to plan joint maneuvers in the Mediterranean region. Reagan said it was an effort to respond to a "mutual threat posed by increased Soviet involvement in the Middle East."

The Reagan administration also promised to resume delivery of American-made cluster bomb artillery shells to Israel. Delivery was suspended in July 1982 after the Israelis invaded Lebanon to force out the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Children, Tulsa ballet to join in 'Nutcracker' rendition

By TOM DOWNING
Staff Writer

The usual curtain time has been moved ahead an hour to 7 p.m. so members of the audience may get to bed early and have visions of mice and toy soldiers dancing in their heads.

The K-State Orchestra will provide the accompaniment Tuesday and Wednesday evening as the Tulsa Ballet Theatre performs "The Nutcracker" in McCain Auditorium.

Children from Manhattan ages five to 12 will perform with the company in the classic Christmas ballet. Linda Johnson, senior in theatre and dance instructor for the Susan Warden Dancers' studio, said the children will dance the parts of mice, angels, soldiers, rabbits and clowns.

"It's wonderful that the Tulsa Ballet provides the opportunity for the local dancers to join the company in this production," she said. "It's good for the children at that age to be exposed to serious artists and to dance in that caliber of a production."

The Tulsa Ballet has an interesting history and has won acclaim from audiences and critics. The company is one of eight ballet companies that has been named a "Major Company" by the National Association for Regional Ballet.

The Tulsa Ballet Theatre employs 24 dancers and has a repertory of 40 ballets. The company was created by two dancers, Roman Jasinski and Moscelyne Larkin, who fell in love and married on tour in Buenos Aires.

They came to the United States and joined the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, where both danced leading roles.

After their son was born they settled in Tulsa, Okla., and in 1954 they did something unusual — they started a ballet school for boys only.

Two years later the Jasinskis formed a small company of dancers from Tulsa area ballet schools. Proceeds from the performances were donated to the dental care of underprivileged children. This company soon became the Tulsa Civic Ballet and began to receive national recognition as a professional company.

In 1978, because of the artistic direction of the company, the name was changed to the Tulsa Ballet Theatre.

Tickets for the 7 p.m. performances cost $8 for the general public, $7 for senior citizens and $6 for students. Balcony seats are $1 less. Tickets are available at the McCain Box Office.

Cats act as 'watchdogs' in Italy

NAPLES, Italy — A security guard in the nearby town of Casoria had more faith in big cats than watchdogs, police said Sunday.

Officers making a check of a liquid gas storage site on Saturday night were greeted by the roar of two lions on guard duty.

Watchman Pasquale Renzi later said he bought the animals as cubs from a traveling circus for $200 and raised them to help him guard because they made him "feel more secure."

The lions, which had been kept in a shed in the storage site, were turned over to the Naples Zoo on Sunday.

Skating mules? Believe it or not

JUNCTION CITY, Ore. — What has 16 wheels and eats carrots? Abigail, the roller-skating mule, of course.

"She's the best skating mule I've ever seen," bragged her trainer, James Bails, who noted she's also the only roller-skating mule he's ever seen.

Bails said he spent years looking for a mule he could train to skate. Then his nephew called him about four months ago to say "he had the mule I've been looking for."

"Well, we tried her out, and she's been improving ever since," he said as the donkey-Shetland pony hybrid skated around the rink, even managing cross-over maneuvers with her front legs to turn.

Bails said Abigail initially was as stubborn as a mule — naturally — about skating, but bribes of cigarettes and sugar cubes changed all that.

As he showed off the 4-year-old last week at the Benton-Lane Roller Rink, Bails said, "I've wanted to do this ever since I was a kid. It's sort of a dream come true."

Bails said formal shows of Abigail's talents will be Dec. 10 and 11, noting, "There are some things people just have to see to believe."

Coach takes vow on 50-yard line

WALL TOWNSHIP, N.J. — Last summer, a high school football coach vowed that if his team made it to the state championships, he'd remarry his ex-wife on the 50-yard-line.

On Saturday, Carl Mayo did it. He was nine yards off, but he did it — and then he jumped on the bus to coach his team in the state finals.

Carl and Carolee Mayo, who were married for 21 years and divorced for three, exchanged vows Saturday before the Rev. M. Dwight Sweezy, the Methodist chaplain at the New Jersey Military Academy in Seagirt. About 35 friends and family members, including two of the couple's three children, also attended.

Woman claims pill caused cancer

LOS ANGELES — A woman with breast cancer has sued the manufacturer of Demulen birth control pills for $20 million, claiming a study showed that such high-progesterone contraceptives posed a cancer risk to young women.

The Superior Court suit, filed Friday on behalf of 29-year-old Selma Schimmel, claims negligence and product liability against G.D. Searle & Co. Schimmel said she used the pill for 10 years before a malignant tumor was discovered in her breast last April.

A recent study at the University of Southern California showed that young, long-term users of such pills run a fourfold increased risk of getting breast cancer, Schimmel's attorney said. The suit said the manufacturers had a duty to inform consumers of the risks

Ex-congressman finds lobbying more lucrative

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In 1982, the voters of Bergen County, N.J., retired Rep. Harold C. Hollenbeck. An easy-going Republican with three terms under his belt, Hollenbeck thought he might have more influence with his colleagues than he had with his constituents, and he sought work as a lobbyist.

In a candid interview, Hollenbeck said last week that his past associations made his first year as a lobbyist more lucrative than his last year as a congressman.

The 44-year-old Hollenbeck offered a rare insider's peek at the advantages he has when he tugs at the elbows of former colleagues.

Lobbying is a world in which access is everything, in which corporations gladly pay thousands of dollars to people who can reach the inner offices of powerful committee members. For his efforts this year, Hollenbeck says he will make $70,000, more than his 1982 congressional salary of $60,662.

It's money, he says, that is well deserved, as he illustrated by his efforts on behalf of an engineering firm that did work on the since-killed Clinch River breeder reactor in Tennessee.

"We were being very successful when I was able to gain access and bring in project managers to different members," he said. "We can bring in the project manager and someone else from the firm and really have a detailed conversation on it."

"In essence, that means you are able to get around the staff and you get to see the member and focus him on the issue, rather than just have him take a notecard or piece of paper from the staff before he goes in to take a vote."

Getting in doorways, however, is just part of the services Hollenbeck says his years in the House help him provide.

"There are times when it's not access to getting into offices, but access to information," he said. "I can't tell my sources, but because of the contacts you make, whether it's members or chief staff people, we are able to find out a day or two before when something major will pop, and that a bill will go in possibly or a chairman will make a statement."

Hollenbeck says he and others at his firm "have a network of staffers who we can rely on. We don't have to call, they'll call us and tip us."

That is an important competitive edge in a town with 10,000 lobbyists.

Hollenbeck has worked since February as a member of a six-person firm whose associates include three other former representatives: Jack McDonald, a Michigan Republican; Dawson Mathis, a Georgia Democrat; and James Roosevelt, a California Democrat and son of President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

It's a firm that has attracted clients including Dow Chemical, American Express and the government of Haiti.

And for their fee, the companies are treated to help from people who know what it is like to be on the receiving end of lobbying. Hollenbeck, for example, says he prefers meeting congressmen in their offices and not the cloakrooms near the House chamber.

Hollenbeck, who was a leader of the Gypsy Moth group of liberal Republicans who at times strayed from supporting President Reagan, says he has yet to lobby for an issue that he opposed as a lawmaker. He says, however, that he would not hesitate to do so.

"You're being paid to represent a point of view," he said. "I really don't have a moral or ethical problem with that. The fact that I was in Congress and had positions doesn't make me any different than another lobbyist who privately has positions."

Chiefs unable to win mistake-filled game

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Mike Kennedy returned an interception 22 yards for a fourth-period touchdown and Joe Cribbs rushed for a career-high 185 yards Sunday to lift the Buffalo Bills to a 14-9 victory over the Kansas City Chiefs in a mistake-filled National Football League game.

With quarterback Joe Ferguson completing only six of 15 passes for 76 yards, Cribbs provided most of the Buffalo offense with a career-high 36 rushes.

Ferguson did not attempt a pass in the Chiefs-dominated first period, then hit four in a row for 75 yards in a second-quarter touchdown drive capped by Perry Tuttle's 17-yard touchdown reception. Ferguson tied his own Buffalo record with his 25th scoring pass of the year.

Kennedy stole Bill Kenney's pass at the Chiefs' 22 and dove into the end zone with 1:50 elapsed in the fourth period to put Buffalo on top 14-6. It was the Bills' first interception return for a touchdown since Dec. 6, 1980. The victory raised the Bills' record to 8-6 and kept their playoff hopes alive.

A crowd of only 27,104 showed up to watch the Chiefs lose their third in a row and drop to 5-9 under first-year head coach John Mackovic.

Nick Lowery kicked field goals of 48 yards in the second quarter and 25 in the third. With 40 seconds left in the first half, the Chiefs had a first-and-goal from the Buffalo 1-yard line, but although given an extra down by a Bills' penalty, failed to score on five plays.

The Chiefs, who scored 48 points the week before in an overtime loss to Seattle, got a 42-yard field goal from Lowery in the fourth period with 4:47 to play.

In the first period, Kansas City kept the ball 10:50 to just 4:10 for Buffalo. The Bills were flagged for three penalties in the sloppy opening period and gave up the ball on a Cribbs fumble on their only possession. But the Chiefs, setting the tone for the cold, overcast day, failed to cash in and the usually reliable Lowery missed on a 42-yard attempt near the end of the scoreless period.

The Chiefs got the ball with 2:55 left in the first half on the Buffalo 44 and quickly drove into scoring position behind Kenney's passing. On third-and-goal from the 1, Buffalo was called for defensive holding. On four straight shots from the 1-yard line, Billy Jackson was held for no gain, Willie Scott dropped a pass, Theotis Brown was stopped for no gain, and Kenney passed incomplete to Carlos Carson.

The season ended for Henry Marshall, Kansas City's veteran wide receiver, on a teeth-rattling tackle in the first period by linebacker Lucius Sanford. Marshall, who had caught 49 passes for 765 yards and a team-leading six touchdowns, suffered a broken left arm.

Ballesteros wins match

By The Associated Press

SUN CITY, Bophuthatswana — Seve Ballesteros of Spain putted with surgical precision Sunday and finished with a 4-under-par 68 to win the Million Dollar Golf Challenge by 5 strokes.

Ballesteros, who collected four birdies, completed the four-day tournament at the par-72, 7,691-yard Gary Player Country Club course with a 274 total, 14 strokes under par. His first-place prize was $300,000.

Tied at 279 for second place in the field of 10 were Australian David Graham, Britain's Nick Faldo and American Fuzzy Zoeller. Graham fired a 70, Faldo had a 69 and Zoeller shot a 65. Each earned $80,000.

Americans Ray Floyd and Johnny Miller were tied for third at 281 — worth $71,000. Floyd shot 1-under-par 71 and Miller finished with a 68.

Ballesteros started the final round 10 strokes under par and 3 ahead of Graham. Faldo, his partner, picked up 2 strokes on the front nine and birdied the par-5 second and par-4 sixth.

Ballesteros, the U.S. Masters times Sunday and birdied both the par-4 fifth and 10th and the par-3 12th.

American Lee Trevino earned $60,000 for finishing fourth with a 70 and a 282 total. Craig Stadler also shot a 70 and finished fifth at 284, picking up a $56,000 check.

South African Nicky Price and American Larry Nelson tied for last place at 285. Price shot a 69, while Nelson finished at par. Even they collected $51,000 in this rich event.

The Challenge is one of the few $1 million tournaments in golf.

Miller beat Ballesteros in a nine-hole playoff to win the final Challenge in January 1982. Floyd beat Stadler in a playoff last year.

Player designed the course in the basin of a dormant volcano at the gambling resort in the South African-created homeland of Bophuthatswana — which South Africa alone recognizes as an independent country.

Because of South Africa's race segregation system, the tournament is not sanctioned by any overseas professional golf association.

Wildcats turn in meager performance

By SEAN REILLY
Sports Editor

Behind the sparkling play of Ben Mitchell and Lafayette Watkins, who came off the bench, the K-State men's basketball team defeated U.S. International 83-62 Saturday night to even out its overall record at 2-2.

Despite fine performances from Mitchell and Watkins, Hartman was a bit despondent on the team's play.

"We weren't very sharp. You never really know how much credit to give to the other team, but they (U.S. International) shot the ball very well tonight," Hartman said.

"You always like to have your teams get progressively better each time they play, but basketball is not meant to be played that way."

In the first half, the 'Cats were unable to effectively put the Gulls away. The Gulls tied the score eight times in the game, and with just 5:29 left in the first half they took the lead for the first time 26-24.

Just before halftime though, after two more lead exchanges, U.S. International called a timeout at 2:27 with the score tied at 30-30. Then the 'Cats ran off seven unanswered points to give themselves a 37-30 intermission lead.

Sophomore guard Jim Roder, who accounted for five of the seven points, sandwiched a 15-foot jumper and a three-point play around a Watkins layup.

The 'Cats started the second half in much the same manner as they ended the first, scoring six unanswered points to increase their lead to 43-30 before Brett Crawford, the Gulls' leading scorer who came into the game with a 30.7 points per game average, ended a five minute scoring drought with a pair of baseline jumpers.

Crawford then connected on a charity shot after he was fouled by Mitchell to slice the 'Cats' lead to 43-35. After the teams traded off a pair of buckets, leaving the Gulls still eight points behind, it turned out that would be the closest they would come to the 'Cats the rest of the night.

Mitchell, who finished with 15 points, took over at the 13:39 mark as he scored 11 of the team's next 15 tallies to boost the 'Cats into a comfortable 64-53 advantage.

The lead did not stop there, however, as the 'Cats poured in another eight unanswered points to increase their lead to 72-53, before 5-foot-3 guard Zach Lieberman, who was averaging 8.3 points despite short stature, made his only point of the night on a charity shot to make it 72-54.

Jim Roder and Lafayette Watkins attempt to block a pass late in the game by U.S. International's Zach Lieberman. Roder tallied 19 points in the contest with Watkins adding a respectable 15 to help K-State defeat the Gulls 83-62 in Ahearn Field House Saturday night. The Wildcats are 2-2 for the season with both victories at home.

Then it was Watkins' turn as he hit seven of the 'Cats next nine points to bring the score to 81-60. Sophomore guard Jonas Cody connected on a pair of free throws to give the 'Cats a 23-point lead, their largest margin of the evening.

"I'm extremely proud of his ballgame tonight," Hartman said of Watkins' performance off the bench. "He didn't miss a shot from the field and got into a great rhythm tonight. He struggled somewhat in the past but tonight he had a very good game."

A bucket by the Gulls with five seconds left in the game, accounted for the final score of the game, 83-62.

Even though the 'Cats won by a sizable margin, the Gulls' Head Coach Freddie Goss said the 'Cats did not overly impress him.

"They're not 20 points better than us," Goss said. "They won by 20 points though. K-State and the crowd wore us down. They got us out of our offense and defensive game plan."

"We played well in the first half, good enough to win, I thought. In the second half, we were taken completely out of our formation," Goss added.

Leading scorer for the 'Cats was Roder with 19 points. Mitchell and Watkins each had 15 points and Tom Alfaro ended up with 12. Mitchell led the team in rebounds with seven and tied with Alex Williams.

For the Gulls, Crawford had a total of 20 points, far below his average of 30 points a game. The Gulls beat the 'Cats on the boards with 40 rebounds to the 'Cats' 34.

Rozier captures coveted Heisman Trophy

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Mike Rozier of the University of Nebraska, only the second man in NCAA history to rush for more than 2,000 yards in a season, won the Heisman Trophy Saturday night.

Staff/Andy Nelson

Nebraska running back Mike Rozier won the prestigious Heisman Trophy Saturday as the best college football player in the nation. Rozier piled up 2,148 yards rushing and 29 touchdowns, leading the Cornhuskers to an undefeated season and No. 1 ranking in the polls.

season in leading Nebraska to a No. 1 ranking, a berth in the Orange Bowl Jan. 2 against Miami, Fla., and a possible national championship.

The only other player to rush for more than 2,000 yards in a season was Southern Cal's Marcus Allen, who ran for 2,342 yards in 1981, the year he won the Heisman. Rozier ended his career with 4,780 yards rushing for a Big Eight Conference record, and he set an NCAA record with 29 rushing touchdowns this season.

In becoming the only Nebraska player to win the Heisman besides Johnny Rodgers in 1972, Rozier, who received 1,801 points, outpooled quarterbacks Steve Young of Brigham Young, who had 1,172, and Doug Flutie of Boston College, who finished with 253 points from the 1,050 voters in the six regions comprising the Heisman Memorial Trophy Committee.

Rodgers, a flanker, also was the last non-running back to win the award. The last quarterback to win the award was Pat Sullivan of Auburn in 1971.

Rozier will receive the award on Thursday at a formal dinner at the New York Hilton.

Rounding out the list of top 10 finishers were Rozier's teammate, quarterback Turner Gill, defensive back Terry Hooge of Georgia, running back Napoleon McCallum of Navy, quarterback Jeff Hostetler of West Virginia, offensive tackle Bill Fralic of Pittsburgh, quarterback Walter Lewis of Alabama and quarterback Norman "Boomer" Esiason of Maryland.

Rozier, a 5-foot-10 210-pounder from Camden, N.J., actually was recruited by Nebraska by accident.

Former freshman coach Frank Solich, now the Cornhuskers' varsity backfield coach, went to a game in New Jersey five years ago to recruit a tight end, whose name he doesn't even remember.

But, during the game, he saw Rozier and was impressed — impressed enough to inquire about the player.

"I asked the coach where the back's school was, went over there and started recruiting Mike," Solich says.

Rozier spent his first college year at Coffeyville Junior College to improve his grades, then moved to Nebraska. The rest is history.

During his sophomore season, Rozier teamed with Roger Craig in Nebraska's I-back formation to gain 949 yards. Last year, he rushed for 1,721 yards and was named Big Eight Offensive Player of the Year. With 4.54 speed in the 40-yard dash, Rozier competed on Nebraska's indoor track team in 1982. It was that speed, along with his ability to bench press 325 pounds, that made Rozier the premier runner in college this year.

In the second game of the season, Rozier surpassed I.M. Hipp's school rushing record of 2,814 yards. The previous Big Eight rushing record was held by Oklahoma State's Terry Miller, who ran for 4,582 yards from 1974-77. And Rozier's 29 rushing touchdowns broke the single-season mark of Penn State's Lydell Mitchell, who ran for 26 touchdowns in 1971.

Rozier also set an NCAA record with an average of 7.156 yards on 668 carries. He tied NCAA marks for touchdowns scored in a season with 29 and for consecutive 100-yard games with 11.

Last year's Heisman winner was junior running back Herschel Walker of Georgia.

Rozier was worried about graduating from high school. Now he's worried about winning the national collegiate football championship. Along the way, he won a Heisman.

Rain helps Auburn in stopping 'Bama

By The Associated Press

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — Cornerback David King said third-ranked Auburn needed "a 12th defensive weapon" to repel 19th-ranked Alabama — and they got it, in the form of a drenching fourth-quarter rain.

The Sugar Bowl-bound Tigers had taken the lead for good late in the third quarter on Bo Jackson's second long touchdown run, a 71-yarder, and then held on in the downpour for a 23-20 triumph over the Crimson Tide on Saturday.

The victory sends the Tigers into the New Orleans battle with No. 8 Michigan with a 10-1 record and completed a perfect 6-0 Southeastern Conference campaign. An Alabama victory would have thrown the SEC championship into a three-way tie among Auburn, Alabama and seventh-ranked Georgia.

Jackson, a gifted sophomore, opened the scoring with a 69-yard sprint in the second quarter and used the two long touchdown runs for the major part of a 256-yard effort on 20 carries. The ultimate game-winner came with 2:03 left in the third quarter on the first play from scrimmage after Ricky Moore had given Alabama a 20-16 advantage with a 57-yard scoring scamper.

Then the rains came and turned what had been an offensive showcase into a series of turnovers, with both teams losing fumbles and Alabama also being victimized by a pair of Victor Beasley pass interceptions, the last with 1:43 remaining to enable the Tigers to run out the clock.

"I looked up and I knew we were going to win cause we had the Lord on our side," King said. "We needed a 12th defensive weapon, and he gave it to us. The rain. That sort of limited what Walter Lewis could do."

The fear of Lewis' scrambling and passing had enabled Alabama to rush for 289 yards against the best rushing defense in the SEC.

Freshman Kerry Goode hampered out 142 yards on 17 carries and Moore contributed 109 on 12. The Tide used the draw play effectively in the first half, getting 71 yards on four such plays, but Auburn adjusted in the second half when four more draws netted only 23 yards.

The Tide running game was the key to three scoring drives that covered 84, 80 and 80 yards, with Lewis capping the first two with touchdown passes of 20 yards to Joey Jones and 3 yards to Joe Carter.

Jackson's long runs provided the only Auburn touchdowns, but Al Del Greco completed the scoring with a trio of field goals that covered 29, 26 and 34 yards.

Alabama Coach Ray Perkins was asked if Jackson was the difference.

"Yup," he said. "I don't think you have to know much about football to say that. I mean, from where I was sitting he was. I said he was better than Herschel Walker. He's speedier, tougher, and he was just as quick and faster today."

"I wouldn't say I had a great day," Jackson said. "The Auburn football team and the Auburn fans had a great day."

Trades to highlight talks

By The Associated Press

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Baseball's annual winter meetings open today amid feelings of renewed interest in trades and the need to find the game a new commissioner.

The first major bit of business here, however, might well have nothing to do with players or commissioners.

There were reports in New York that Yankees owner George Steinbrenner was poised to fire Manager Billy Martin. Yankees first base coach Yogi Berra, a Hall of Fame catcher for the Yankees who managed the club in 1964, reportedly was the heir apparent.

"I'd have to think about it," Berra told The Associated Press. Meanwhile, the New York Daily News reported Sunday that Steinbrenner would make the announcement at the winter meetings Tuesday night.

Part of the reason clubs are looking to improve themselves through trade is because the free agent market this year was judged weak, said Buzzie Bavasi, general manager and executive vice president of the California Angels.

Women's basketball team stops 'Cats

By VIKKI WATSON
Staff Writer

Led by five players in double figures, the K-State women's basketball team crushed the Wildcats of Northwestern University, 97-65, Saturday at Evanston, Ill.

K-State, currently 4-0 and ranked seventh in the nation, quickly fell behind 4-0 but countered with 12 straight unanswered points to take the lead. The 'Cats never trailed again in the contest.

K-State Head Coach Lynn Hickey said rebounding would be crucial for the team's success, and this proved to be an accurate indication as K-State outnumbered Northwestern in the rebounding department with a 49-27 advantage. Six-foot-one junior Angie Bonner led the K-State cause with 10 rebounds followed by 6'1" sophomore Jennifer Jones, who grabbed nine.

Jones, who hails from Chicago, gave her hometown area a display of scoring talent as well, canning nine of 14 shots and two free throws for 20 points. Jones equaled her best scoring performance of the season.

"Jennifer had a great game," said Hickey. "It was good for her to play back at home."

Despite the win, the aggressive, defense-minded Northwestern still caused 31 K-State turnovers — an area that Hickey said still needs improvement for upcoming contests.

But it was K-State's defense, combined with rebounding strength and depth, which gave Northwestern fits in the end, accounting for a 35-24 halftime lead and the 32-point victory.

"We had a great attitude on the floor and the best defensive effort ever," said Hickey. "Northwestern had a good press and caused us to make some mistakes, but overall our size and depth prevailed."

"I was very pleased with our overall performance," she continued. "It was just a great team effort."

K-State, which shot 56.3 percent from the field, also improved upon a recent poor free throw performance against Wichita State University, hitting 85 percent in Saturday's contest.

Northwestern, which hit 39.7 from the field and 60 percent from the line, was led by six-foot-one Anucha Browne with 22 points and Anne Smith with 13.

Bonner and Jones led the K-State scoring with 21 and 20 points respectively, while sophomore Tina Dixon added 15 and sophomore Cassandra Jones and senior Barbara Gilmore canned 14 apiece.

Northwestern, which recently lost a one-point decision to defending national champion University of Southern California, falls to 2-2 on the season.

Mexican leader anticipates recovery of economic crisis

By The Associated Press

MEXICO CITY — Mexican officials are looking forward to 1984 as the year President Miguel de la Madrid's anti-corruption and economic austerity programs bring recovery from massive unemployment and inflation.

But the president says that sacrifices must continue, and some critics believe the future still looks grim.

De la Madrid was inaugurated Dec. 1, 1982, promising to clean up corruption and lead Mexico out of a devastating economic crisis that he had inherited from his predecessor, Jose Lopez Portillo.

Although some aspects of his campaign for a "moral renewal" of Mexican society appear to have fizzled, he has regained international confidence in the economy and solidified Mexico's image as a peacemaker in international affairs.

The first year of de la Madrid's presidency has been one of conservative economic, social and foreign policies.

The economic crisis has hit Mexicans' pocketbooks like no crunch in the last 50 years. Three days after taking office, de la Madrid increased gasoline prices by 100 percent. Since then gasoline has doubled again, and prices of other basic consumer goods spiraled as well.

Inflation, more than 100 percent in 1982, is officially estimated at 85 percent in 1983, but many independent economists say it is higher. The government predicts that the rate will slow down next year, with a 40 percent rate the goal.

De la Madrid's austerity programs included cuts in social spending that heightened unemployment. Conservative estimates are that a million Mexicans lost their jobs as the country's industrial plant stalled.

In a Nov. 16 speech, de la Madrid said his government in 1984 will slash inflation, spur industrial development and create 400,000 new jobs. But he cautioned, as he has throughout the year, that the crisis is not over and sacrifices must continue.

De la Madrid was budget and planning secretary under Lopez Portillo. His austerity programs as president have gained praise from international bankers who cite them as responsible for averting national bankruptcy. Unchecked government spending under Lopez Portillo's administration had propelled the country's foreign debt past $80 billion and scarce dollar supplies made it questionable whether payments could be met.

The foreign debt now stands at $85 billion, the second-largest in the developing world after Brazil's, but international bankers speak positively of Mexican management of its crisis in comparison with Brazil's mounting difficulties.

The country's peso currency plummeted through three major devaluations last year. The last of those was ordered by de la Madrid in his first month in office, and a continuing daily mini-devaluation was ordered this fall in hopes of averting another major drop.

The austerity program has earned criticism at home from some independent economists who say the emphasis on controlling inflation is futile and will lead instead to the collapse of Mexican industry.

Predictions of social unrest were heard while the Mexican economy slumped, but calm has been preserved with few exceptions.

While de la Madrid the ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party, known by its Spanish initials as the PRI, has managed to maintain the grip on power it has held for 54 years.

Opposition parties, however, have accused the PRI of fraud in three state elections in November, staining the president's campaign against corruption.

The "moral renewal" campaign was most visible through prosecution and jailing of dozens of officials on fraud or corruption charges.

Among them was Jorge Diaz Serano, a federal senator who directed the state oil monopoly PEMEX during its boom years of the Lopez Portillo administration. He was jailed in July in a $34 million fraud case.

De la Madrid's foreign policy has stressed peaceful resolution of Central American problems through the Contadora group — formed with Panama, Colombia and Venezuela. Ties with Nicaragua and leftist Salvadoran rebels cooled some as the government stressed its neutrality in the region.

While de la Madrid is said not to have the same friendship with Reagan that Lopez Portillo had, he is less vehement in his attacks on U.S. policies. The Mexican and American presidents met Aug. 14 in La Paz in northwestern Mexico.

Economy fails to help homeless

By The Associated Press

On the eve of winter, agencies helping the homeless across America say thousands more down-and-out people are roaming the streets and spending nights in emergency shelters this year.

And a new study concludes that the country's economic recovery has not improved the plight or the numbers of homeless Americans.

"Underneath the veneer of recovery, the problem of homelessness remains at pre-recovery levels. In fact, indications are that it has increased," said the National Coalition for the Homeless in a report, "The Homeless and The Economic Recovery."

"The coming of cold weather can only compound an already critical situation," the report concluded.

From New York to California, soup lines are longer, beds are being filled up more quickly and there are more people living on the streets.

New York City is providing shelter for twice as many families as last year. The Los Angeles Mission reports a 10 percent increase in the number of men being sheltered in its 70-bed facility.

In Helena, Mont., the Salvation Army says it has given lodging assistance to 1,287 homeless people this year, up about 60 percent from last year. The St. Vincent de Paul Transient Assistance office in Phoenix, Ariz., has been receiving an average of 32 requests a day for emergency housing from families.

"There will be virtually no empty beds in emergency shelters anywhere in the country tonight, tomorrow night and the next night," said Robert Hayes, director of the National Coalition for the Homeless.

The number of homeless nationwide — estimated at about 2 million last year — may now be 3 million, the highest number since the 1930s, said Hayes. About half of them are mentally disturbed, drug addicts or alcoholics; the other half could live independently, he added.

"They're not the strongest or the smartest people in the country, but they are employable people who, in a better housing market, would be able to hold on," he said.

The coalition says the homeless have been untouched by the economic recovery because of a lack of low-income housing, cutbacks in public assistance programs and a paucity of jobs for unskilled workers. The national jobless rate, which has been dropping, doesn't count people who have exhausted their unemployment benefits, the coalition noted.

The New York City Coalition for the Homeless estimates that 40,000 to 60,000 people passed through emergency shelters in 1983 and the city is spending more than $50 million annually on the homeless.

In Chicago, the homeless number as many as 25,000, an increase over the 12,000 homeless last year, partly due to the demolition of 3,000 single-room dwellings. An estimated 9,000 are homeless in Detroit, up from 6,500 last year.

A recent study in Pittsburgh concluded that about 1,500 people would be homeless at some time this winter. The demand for shelter seems to be increasing.

"We are beyond our capacity and have been for six months," said Sister Mercia O'Neil, director of a church-sponsored shelter for women in Pittsburgh.

About 10,000 people are homeless in Massachusetts, 2,800 of them in Boston, state officials say. Two new shelters with 155 beds opened in Boston recently, but the demand for beds still outstrips the supply. In one Boston shelter, more than 100 people are sleeping on the floor.

There are some positive signs, however, in Massachusetts and elsewhere. Massachusetts Gov. Michael Dukakis signed a bill in October that has the state welfare office paying 75 percent of the operating costs of nine new emergency shelters across the state.

Although Rhode Island expects more homeless this winter than it had last year, it is better prepared to help them with $290,000 in federal money it is using for shelters. A new shelter for homeless families opens this week in Providence.

Some homeless people in Minneapolis and St. Paul, Minn., received a boost when the state reinstated year-round general assistance payments of $199 a month.

'Nutcracker' director remembers five decades of ballet

By TOM DOWNING
Staff Writer

Roman Jasinski first danced in the United States in 1934 and has lived through nearly 50 years of ballet history.

He was a leading dancer with the Ballet Russe and the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. Jasinski is the co-founder and co-artistic director of the Tulsa Ballet Theatre.

The company is in Manhattan for performances of "The Nutcracker" tonight and tomorrow evening in McCain Auditorium.

Jasinski said ballet is the leader of any art form in America.

"Nobody can fill up the theater like ballet," he said. "We have the best ballet than anybody in Europe."

Before Jasinski married Moscelyne Larkin and settled in Tulsa, Okla. in 1954, he didn't have anything.

"I was living all my life in a trunk," Jasinski said.

Both Jasinski and Larkin were leading dancers when they were first married. When their son, Roman, was born, they were still under contract with the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo.

"They let us out of the contract, but we didn't finish the season," he said. "We stopped dancing and opened the school."

There was no ballet company in Tulsa when the Jasinskis arrived.

"The school was good, but we found we'd like to do something with the ballet," he said.

One-third of the current Tulsa Ballet dancers were trained at the school.

"We try to keep the dancers all the time with us. It's because this way you grow," he said.

Jasinski said the dancers are living in Tulsa and buying their homes and spending their money there. Times are different now than when he was dancing, he said.

"You don't need to fight for existence; the life, it's more comfortable now than when I first came to this country," he said. "America has great opportunity. You can always get a job. In Europe if you find a job, you stick to it with your teeth, you don't let go. Most of the dancers (in America), they like to change companies."

Jasinski visited his native Poland this year and said he traveled by train because "you can see the real life."

"You have everything you want here (in America). If you are cold — punch a button and you are hot. If you are hot — punch another button and you are cold."

He said it is painful to see how the people in Poland can exist under current conditions. Everything is rationed, he said. There is a 10 to 15 year wait to buy furniture.

Jasinski said he wanted to look up old friends and asked for a phone directory at the hotel. "We have no telephone books this year," they told me."

When Jasinski first performed in the United States in 1934 in a theater on Broadway and 44th Street, he danced and wore tights in a then-unknown ballet, "Le Sylphides."

"To see a man in tights, it was shocking. They whistled at me," he said. "You can see people naked now and it's not shocking anymore."

The company has been successful at keeping its dancers and in getting former dancers to return.

Principal dancer Melissa Hale said that Tulsa offers an alternative to dancing in New York. She said that when she graduated from high school, the only place to go was New York, but now things have changed. She returned to Tulsa Ballet after dancing with the American Ballet Theatre.

"Tulsa is my home...and I love dancing for the Jasinskis," Hale said.

This is the third year the company has been touring in the Midwest.

"Every year I can see the difference. They (the audience) know a little bit more and the houses are sold out," he said.

"It took years before the ballet became popular. Now the company sells out at most cities."

Last week the company danced in Enid, Okla., its first visit, and it was the first time any performance had sold out there, he said.

In the last four years, the company has put more emphasis on scenery, costumes, and lighting because of its increased budget. Next year, the company expects a budget of around $1 million.

"We're supporting ourselves," Jasinski said. "Sixty percent of the budget comes from performances."

The K-State orchestra will provide the accompaniment as 30 children from Manhattan ballet schools dance with the company.

After the current nine-city tour, "The Nutcracker" will be performed in Tulsa. Jasinski's wife is at home working with about 200 area children who will dance with the company.

Co-founder and co-artistic director of the Tulsa Ballet Theatre, Roman Jasinski, makes suggestions during a break in Monday's rehearsal of the

"The Nutcracker." Performances will be tonight and Wednesday night in McCain Auditorium.

Bus classes continue despite picket's death

By The Associated Press

ZANESVILLE, Ohio — A Greyhound striker was run over and killed Monday when a group of pickets swarmed a bus being used to train replacement drivers as it slowed for a stop sign. Authorities said they didn't know whether the driver would be charged.

Greyhound officials suspended a class in progress here because of the incident and canceled all classes nationwide that have not started yet, spokeswoman Leslie White said from company headquarters in Phoenix, Ariz.

"The classes that were already in progress will continue," she said.

Greyhound officials also said they expect their buses to be back in full operation by Dec. 21 or 22 if union workers accept a new contract proposal. Results of the voting are expected to be announced Dec. 20, Greyhound spokesman Don Behnke said.

The dead man was identified by the State Highway Patrol as Raymond Phillips, 42, Willoughby, a member of Amalgamated Transit Union Local 1043 of Cleveland.

State Patrol Capt. Warren Davies identified the bus driver as Lewis A. Harris, 28, from Cleveland.

"We are investigating whether there will be charges. We don't know yet," Davies said.

The incident occurred about 8:30 a.m. at an intersection just off Interstate 70 in east central Ohio, where Greyhound has been using four unmarked buses to train drivers. Witnesses said a group of more than 50 protesters had gathered around the moving bus as it slowed for a stop sign.

"I had a good view, and seen exactly what happened," said Gary Kuntz, 33, manager of a service station at the intersection.

"The bus stopped. Then the bus started moving. The pickets got out of its way, and this one guy was hanging on the side, jumping up and trying to hit the mirror," Kuntz said.

Behnke said the company had made no decision about future training classes.

Voting on the proposed pact, meanwhile, will be done by mail.

Greyhound strikers were asked Saturday to vote on the tentative settlement that would cut their wages and force them to accept other financial concessions to end the month-long, violence-marred strike.

Union leaders said they would urge the more than 12,700 striking Greyhound workers to ratify the settlement and end the walkout against the country's largest inter-city bus line.

Some union workers, still walking the picket line, predicted the rank and file would reject the pact reached by their leaders.

Bomb kills 14 amid violence in Beirut

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — A car bomb shattered a nine-story apartment building in Moslem west Beirut on Monday, killing 14 people and wounding 84 in a new surge of violence in Lebanese capital.

With the U.S.-Syrian confrontation growing, the United States said its planes caused "significant damage" to Syrian positions during a Sunday air raid. It was the first American air strike at Syrian targets, and two American planes were shot down.

The U.S. Navy sent more reconnaissance flights over central Lebanon Monday, but there were no reports that the aircraft were fired on by the Syrians.

The Syrian foreign minister, Lt. Gen. Mustafa Tlass, confirmed that one captured American pilot died after that raid and said another, who was taken alive, would be returned "when the war is over."

Italy's premier hinted that the American air raid had caused Italy to consider pulling its forces out of the multinational force designed to enforce a cease-fire among the warring Lebanese factions.

And the U.S. Marine commander in Beirut said that eight Americans who died in shelling Sunday night probably were killed by a single 120mm mortar round.

No group claimed responsibility for setting off the car bomb, which exploded at 8 a.m. (1 a.m. EST) as people were heading to work and school in the Tareek el-Jedida neighborhood.

Police said 14 people were killed and 84 wounded when an estimated 330 pounds of explosives went off, partially collapsing the building.

Some of those inside were trapped and residents of nearby buildings stumbled into the street dazed and bleeding. A few had been stripped naked by the force of the blast.

There were conflicting reports about whether the bomb might have been intended for another target and gone off prematurely. There was no apparent political or military target where it detonated.

In Washington, the Defense Department said that 28 carrier-based Navy bombers inflicted "significant damage" on Syrian anti-aircraft batteries, ammunition supplies and radar sites in three Lebanese areas on Sunday.

The raid was the first American air strike in Lebanon and the first direct attack against Soviet-backed Syria — which, like Israel, occupies large portions of Lebanese territory.

Secretary of State George P. Shultz said in Washington that the use of U.S. airpower did not foreshadow an American effort to impose a military solution in Lebanon, and called on the Soviet Union to use its influence with Syria to moderate that country's policies.

Asked if the United States would attack Syria if U.S. planes were fired upon directly by Syrian forces, Shultz replied that, "we will defend ourselves," but added that America is looking for solutions rather than conflict.

Tlass said in a telephone interview in Damascus that the captured American pilot, Lt. Robert O. Goodman, 27, from Virginia Beach, Va., was "in excellent condition...suffering no injury."

Asked when Goodman would be returned to the United States, Tlass replied, "Like in all wars, when the war is over; that is, when the United States will leave Lebanon."

Tlass also confirmed that Lt. Mark A. Lange from Fraser, Mich., died after he was captured. Lange and Goodman were aboard a two-seat A-6 from the carrier John F. Kennedy. The pilot of the other plane shot down during the raid was rescued with only minor injuries, the Pentagon said.

Tlass said Lange's body would be turned over to American authorities on Monday, but John Stewart, a U.S. Embassy spokesman in Beirut, said it had not yet been received.

Larry Speakes, the chief White House spokesman in Washington, said the Reagan administration has written to the U.N. Security Council asking Syria to release Goodman and defending the bombing mission as "a discrete measure taken in self-defense."

U.S. defense officials said the air raid was carried out in response to Syrian attempts on Saturday to shoot down unarmed American surveillance planes.

Soviets say arms talks may reach stalemate

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Top Kremlin officials Monday rejected Western "wishful thinking" that the Soviets might return to Euromissile negotiations without U.S. concessions first. They said U.S.-Soviet strategic arms talks are headed toward a similar stalemate.

The Soviets, at a rare news conference for foreign and Soviet reporters, also reaffirmed Moscow's intention to match the new U.S. medium-range missiles in Europe with powerful Soviet submarine missiles off the American coast.

These counter-weapons will "be no less effective than the American systems deployed in Europe, in range, yield, accuracy and what is especially important, in flight time to their targets," said Marshal Nikolai V. Ogarkov, chief of the Soviet general staff.

On other subjects, the officials said Soviet President Yuri V. Andropov, not seen in public since August, is "recovering well" from illness, and they denounced Sunday's U.S. air attacks on Syrian anti-aircraft positions in Lebanon, saying Moscow will support those fighting "Israeli and American aggression."

On Nov. 23, the Soviets suspended talks in Geneva, Switzerland, on medium-range weapons in Europe after new U.S. missiles arrived in Britain and West Germany, part of a NATO deployment designed to counter Soviet SS-20 missiles targeted on Western Europe.

Western diplomats who attended Monday's news conference said it appeared the Soviets wanted to forcefully rebut Western suggestions that the NATO deployment had not radically changed the situation and that the Soviets might be willing to rejoin the talks.

Kornienko said before the Soviets return to the suspended talks the West must signal it is ready to pull back on the missile deployment.

He quoted a letter from Andropov to West German leader Helmut Kohl as saying the Kremlin would not see its Geneva walkout irreversible "if the NATO countries show a readiness to return to the situation that existed before the deployment in Europe of American missiles."

A group of second-year graduate students in landscape architecture presented the results of a three-week study of highway entrances to Manhattan at a slide presentation Monday afternoon in Room 207 of the Union.

The study, which was financed by the students, examined the positive and negative aesthetic aspects of the four primary entrances to Manhattan. Viewers of the presentation, including City Commissioner Rick Mann and Chamber of Commerce Director of Operations Tom Whalen, were taken on a visual tour of the approaches to the city of Kansas Highways 177, 113, 24 and 18.

"What we're trying to analyze is how to maintain a community image," said Arnold Waters, one of the students.

Bill Sullivan, another student, conducted the slide tour, pointing to problems in the transition from rural to urban on almost all the routes. He also criticized the lack of direction the routes give drivers in reaching the University and the downtown business district.

"This system encourages people to go south to a back door entrance," Sullivan said of K-24 as it becomes Tuttle Creek Boulevard and winds south toward downtown. "Someone once analyzed the K-24 east entrance as going around to a service entrance."

Better signs should be placed to direct drivers into downtown from the east and to eliminate confusion for southbound drivers on K-24, Sullivan said.

Switching to an eastern view of buildings in the area of the proposed downtown mall, Sullivan added, "We can learn from this and never let it happen again."

On K-18, the entrance to the city from the southwest, commercial buildings would be more attractive to approaching motorists if they were "clustered" and shielded from the roadway by trees, Sullivan said.

After a motorist leaves the area of the airport on K-18, the hills and winding roadway give him high expectations about entering Manhattan, Sullivan said. But when he coasts to a stop at Fort Riley Boulevard and Rosencutter Road, his expectations are dashed by his eye's constant wandering toward activity in the myriad parking lots there, he said.

The students proposed "screening" unattractive examples of architecture from motorists by planting trees. The plan could be brought about by zoning laws, tax incentives or voluntary cooperation, they said.

Richard Coleman, professor of marketing, said the students' plan to add signs along entrance routes was "among the most winning ideas presented." But he cautioned city leaders against legislating the change.

"I think you're going to come across an awful lot of resistance," Coleman said.

Mann said the time has come for the city to enhance its entrances, but the process will take intergovernmental cooperation.

"I can see the formation of a city-county committee to deal with this," Mann said.

Although three of the four entrances to Manhattan are in Riley County where county leaders have expressed optimism about upgrading the routes, the K-24 east entrance lies in Pottawatomie County, making more cooperation necessary, Mann said.

"Legislating this thing will only serve to make people upset," Mann said. "The spirit (of cooperation) is what has to be established first."

Other students involved in the study included Carol Henry, Gail Stahlecker, Carl Bengston and Dave Durnford. The project was for a course in landscape design taught by Rick Forsyth, assistant dean of the College of Architecture and Design.

Campus

CBS special features K-State choir

The K-State Concert Choir will be featured in this year's "CBS Cavalcade of Christmas Music" radio special. CBS will air the program from New York City at 3 and 8:15 p.m., CST, on Wednesday, Dec. 14.

In the past, affiliate stations in Kansas have recorded the 24-minute program and aired it locally when convenient. This year, the program will be transmitted by satellite and landline to CBS affiliates. The half-hour program was recorded on campus earlier this fall.

The choir, which has annually participated in the holiday special since 1977, will sing traditional and classical Christmas music.

K-State is one of eight schools participating in this year's program. The other schools are Baylor University, Emory University, Indiana University, Pacific Lutheran University, University of Montana, University of Nevada and University of Southern California.

Olathe man establishes scholarship

John H. Johntz Jr. of Olathe has established a scholarship fund in honor of his parents, John Hoffman and Veenetia Birchfield Johntz. The fund will provide scholarships for students majoring in milling, baking or feed science and management at K-State.

Johntz Jr. is a 1932 graduate of K-State in business administration. He worked with Flour Mills of America Inc., from 1932 through 1957. He then became president of Garvey Grain, where he remained until his retirement in 1970. Following his retirement, he became southwest grain manager of Cereal Food Processors Inc., and retired again in February, 1983. He has been a trustee of the K-State Foundation for many years.

The Johntz award will be given annually to a senior in the Department of Grain Science and Industry who has exhibited extraordinary achievement by attaining the highest grade point average in courses taken in the department through his or her junior academic year.

Professor receives honorary degree

Bill Able, professor of animal science and industry, has been awarded the Honorary American Farmer degree by the Future Farmers of America.

The degree, presented during the 56th National FFA Convention in Kansas City, is the highest recognition given to the organization's adult supporters.

Able has served as the official at the national FFA livestock judging contest, held in conjunction with the American Royal, for the past 10 years. He also supervises the state FFA livestock judging contest each year in Manhattan.

Women publish Hispanic book

The combined efforts of three Manhattan women has resulted in a book, "Memories for Tomorrow: Mexican American Recollections of Yesteryear," published by Elaine Ethridge Books.

Margaret Beeson, associate professor of modern languages, Marjorie Adams, associate professor of English, and Rosalie King, Manhattan High School Spanish teacher compiled recollections of Kansas Hispanics for the book.

The bilingual (Spanish-English) book is a compilation of taped conversations and firsthand sketches on the history and culture of the Kansas Mexican-American community.

The book includes folktales, customs and witchcraft collected from 85 Mexican-Americans in Manhattan, Wellington, Chanute, Newton, Hutchinson, Garden City, McPherson, Ulysses and Topeka.

The book does not claim to be a comprehensive study of the history of the Kansas Hispanic community, but "La Voz Del Llano," the newsletter of the Kansas Advisory Committee on Mexican-American Affairs, has described it as "useful and entertaining for readers interested in Mexican history and culture."

Snowballers cause damage to fraternity windows, doors

By The Collegian Staff

Eight plate glass windows were broken and a screen door damaged during a snowball fight at 10 p.m. Sunday in front of the Beta Theta Pi house, 500 Sunset Ave.

Alan Kraft, senior in chemical engineering and member of the Beta house, reported the incident to the Riley County Police Department.

"We looked outside and about 80 males were throwing snowballs at our house," Kraft said.

"This thing (a snowball fight) happens every year, and winds up in front of our house," he said. "Except this year we didn't participate."

Kraft estimated it will cost approximately $25 to repair the damages.

Moore resident avoids rape

By The Collegian Staff

K-State Police are investigating the attempted rape of a 19-year-old woman Sunday morning in Moore Hall.

A man entered the woman's unlocked room between 5:30 and 6 a.m. Sunday, then left for undetermined reasons, said Lt. James Tubach. The woman did not require medical treatment, he said.

Tubach declined Monday to discuss whether police had any suspects in the case, saying the incident was "under investigation." He also refused to reveal on which floor the incident occurred.

Hall Director Mike Harris refused to comment about on which floor the incident occurred.

Sandinista concessions disappoint opposition

By The Associated Press

MANAGUA, Nicaragua — A major opposition leader said Monday that political concessions announced by Nicaragua's governing Sandinistas do not go far enough. A rebel Indian leader rejected the Sandinista offer as "a farce."

The leftist government announced Sunday it would welcome back Nicaraguan exiles, including most of the rebels who have been fighting to topple the Sandinistas, and promised to announce a date early next year for elections in 1985.

"To be frank, we were hoping the decrees would be broader," said a leader of the Constitutionalist Liberal Party, one of the country's four opposition parties. The other parties have not commented yet.

The Liberal party leader, who spoke on condition he not be identified, complained that the amnesty-like decree, which offers safe conduct home, property rights and voting rights to exiles, gives them too little time to act. The offer expires Feb. 21.

The decree would cover thousands of anti-Sandinista rebels fighting with the Costa Rica-based Revolutionary Democratic Alliance and the Honduras-based Nicaraguan Democratic Force, but it excludes rebel leaders.

Of the decree promising a 1985 election date, the Liberal leader noted that it made no mention of press freedom, which he called "indispensable in every election period."

In Tegucigalpa, Honduras, the leader of rebellious Nicaraguan Indians called the amnesty offer "a farce."

"This decree is a maneuver mounted by the leftist regime in Managua so that the governments of Latin America think Nicaragua is seeking a negotiated solution to the problems it is confronting," Steadman Fagoth Muller said.

"We definitely are against a negotiated or political solution. We, the Indians, do not accept a negotiated alternative...because you have to tear evil out by its roots."

The fighting continues, meanwhile, in Nicaragua's guerrilla wars. The Defense Ministry reported Monday at least 28 rebels and 17 government soldiers had been killed in clashes in northern Nicaragua between Nov. 24 and Dec. 3.

The two decrees were announced at the annual closing of the Council of State, an advisory legislative group.

U.S. Ambassador Anthony Quainton said the United States would be "pleased if free elections are carried out in Nicaragua." But he said there is still much to be worked out regarding the two new decrees.

"We believe...negotiations should continue with the support of the Contadora group," he said. "The United States will continue to seek fundamental solutions to the problems of Central America through that group."

Withheld records lead judge to kill Penthouse libel case

By The Associated Press

BALTIMORE — A federal judge dismissed a scientist's libel suit against Penthouse magazine Monday after the U.S. government took the rare step of refusing to release documents because of national security.

The suit, filed by James W. Fitzgerald, of Bethesda, alleged that a June 1977 article in Penthouse entitled "The Pentagon's Deadly Pets" libelously charged him with espionage. Penthouse International Ltd., the magazine's publishers, was named in the suit, which sought $3 million in damages.

Both sides needed classified documents for their case. But in a rare move, John Lehman, secretary of the U.S. Navy, filed two declarations on Dec. 5, one public and one sealed. The public document said the documents could not be released because of the government's privilege to withhold information whose release could damage national security.

"I invoke the extraordinary measure of asserting a formal claim of state secrets privilege," he said in the public document.

The article concerned the alleged training of animals for military and intelligence purposes by the U.S.

Navy and the Central Intelligence Agency.

Among the animals mentioned were dolphins, which Fitzgerald was testing for potential military purposes for the Navy and CIA at an outpost in Key West, Fla.

The article said that Fitzgerald, while conducting secret experiments, "made overtures" to sell "dolphin torpedoes" to some Latin American countries.

Fitzgerald maintained the statements were both false and defamatory.

During the seven years in which the case was in litigation, it was appealed to the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond on two different occasions. In each appeal the case was remanded to the District Court here for further proceedings.

In March 1983, the case was appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court to clarify certain issues in the case. The court, without comment, left intact rulings that required Fitzgerald to prove not only that the article was false, but that it was written with "actual malice."

After reviewing Lehman's sealed statement, U.S. District Judge James R. Miller Jr. said that in some cases the government's privilege to withhold information outweighed the private interests.

No aid for lawbreakers

Once again, those who have not registered for the draft and are seeking federal financial aid may find themselves short of luck. The U.S. Supreme Court has agreed to review a Minnesota judge's June 17, 1983, constitutionality ruling on the law which requires all young men eligible for the draft to prove they had registered before receiving financial aid.

Two weeks after U.S. District Judge Donald L. Alsop ruled that the law was unconstitutional, the Supreme Court temporarily reinstated the law until it could decide on Alsop's ruling. It has stood on that basis until this time.

Some of those who are against the law claim that the loss of financial aid is an unfair penalty to pay for not registering for the draft. Considering the fact that anyone who is required to register and does not is blatantly breaking the law, the punishment is not that severe. A loss of aid probably would not disqualify a student from going to college; it would only make it more difficult to make ends meet. Besides, the cost is very small compared to the maximum penalty under federal law — a $10,000 fine and five years in jail.

The common thought of those who refuse to register for the draft while expecting financial aid seems to be that Uncle Sam owes them financial aid and a college education while they are not even obligated to obey the federal laws. The belief is commonly known as biting the hand that feeds you.

Contrary to what some people would have us believe, only a small minority fail to comply with draft registration. According to federal figures, 96.5 percent of those eligible for the draft have registered since 1980. The law will not adversely affect many students.

Despite the questionable military actions of the U.S. government lately, the laws must still be obeyed until they can be changed or done away with. Openly ignoring a law has not proved to be a responsible way of changing a law in the past. It is not a good means now.

The one fault of the bill is that the burden of proof of registration is put on the student. That responsibility should be put on the government. Selective Service records should be used for proof. This would also seem to be a stronger defense for the government in a resulting case. One cannot falsify the proof when the truth is clearly on the records.

The law should be approved by the Supreme Court and enforced by the federal government. Those who do not wish to comply with the laws should not expect to receive anything from a government they refuse to obey. Give the financial aid to those who need it and are willing to obey the laws of those who offer it.

The Christmas spirit

Here comes the Christmas rush. Yes, ladies and gentlemen, it's that time of year again. It's time to lose that weight we gained from Thanksgiving dinner. It's time for mistletoe, snow and Santa Claus to make an appearance.

I've seen a few Santa Claus impersonators floating about, wearing the bright red suits and false white beards. These are fake Santas. They don't have the "natural padding" needed to be a "real" Santa.

I haven't seen any mistletoe hanging around any doorways yet. Must be too early, I guess. No use in spreading those cold germs around during dead week.

I've seen too much snow, and it's only the second week after Thanksgiving. While snow is pretty and does have some benefits, I hate the stuff. I'm not, shall we say, "coordinated." It's hard enough to walk on a dry sidewalk and chew gum at the same time as it is. I don't need any help from Mother Nature in losing my footing.

Christmas shopping has become another venerated American tradition. Some people do their shopping early (for example, July sales are often called "Christmas in July" sales, so people get in the spirit of spending money five months early). Others wait until the day after Thanksgiving before shopping. Some, like me, wait until, oh, about 4:30 p.m. Christmas Eve before even thinking about shopping.

You've seen us in the stores on Christmas Eve, looking at the bare shelves, then our lists, then our checkbooks, then wandering around the store like lost sheep. It's not a bad technique. A lot of stuff goes cheap...that is, whatever's left for us to pick.

One item which won't be left over this year is the Cabbage Patch Doll.

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

These are the ones that are guaranteed to be unique — each one is different, the manufacturer says. These dolls come with a "birth certificate" and "adoption papers."

I don't know who decided these dolls would be the thing to get for Christmas. I didn't. I've seen one. It just looks like a doll. No gold plating, no silk wardrobe, nothing out of the usual.

This hasn't stopped mothers, fathers, grandparents and others from going nuts. A little girl sees the doll on television and asks for one from Santa. Mom and the rest of the folks rush out to their favorite store, only to find out that the store is sold out and has been for two weeks. The store manager tells the parents he'll have some more dolls in a few days.

When the dolls arrive at the store, the manager faces a problem. How do you tell your customers that you only have 12 dolls, when there are at least 10 or 20 times as many people waiting outside?

This doll has a nation up in arms. Some stores have had crowds camp out overnight, just to have a chance at getting one of the dolls. A few fights have occurred. One Kansas City man flew to London and gave his story to a newspaper about why he wanted the doll for his daughter. The newspaper, in exchange for the "exclusive interview," gave the man five dolls.

He flew back to Kansas City and appears on "Nightline" to tell the world his daughter wanted a doll, so he went to London to get her one...er, actually, he gave her two. He gave a television station one doll. The other two were destined for a Kansas City hospital, he said.

I thought about this for a while. Yes, the man must love his daughter a lot. But the cost of flying to London and back probably could have gone to help give a Christmas dinner to many underprivileged families. Or could have paid the utility bills for quite a few elderly people. Or a lot of other things.

I'm not telling this gentleman what to do with his money. He has the right to do with it what he pleases. Which, of course, is "the American way."

Americans can do a lot of strange things with money, but one of the best things we do is buy things with it. We buy all kinds of useless stuff. The big craze a few years ago was the "Star Wars" toys. I haven't seen any for quite a while, now. Mood rings were big at one time, too. Seen one lately? I didn't think so.

I think the "Cabbage Patch Craze" will soon join the rest of the fads from the past and fade away. In fact, if you really want one of these dolls, wait a few months. You can buy all the dolls you want in March.

Christmas is a time of giving. Don't let the holiday rush ruin the spirit of helping others.

Just remember the old saying "the best things in life are free." It's true. The rewards are well worth the effort.

Merry Christmas.

Poor coverage of protest

Editor,
First, I would like to congratulate Edee Dalke on what I feel was her first real good column. She made a good point about protests. You have the right to protest, but it is only your or your group's opinion.

Second, I think your coverage of the rally against U.S. intervention was very poor as far as being neutral, as journalism is supposed to be. You never pointed out any points the opposing side said, only helped the rally organizers' views. You made numerous references to the anti-interventionists' view, but you only mentioned two examples of the other view.

Third, Dan Robinson's comments were vague. Is he implying that Reagan is a communist? I hope not. They realize, hopefully, that Reagan was stopping the advancement of communism. I will agree that the United States should not impose its will, but if we do, isn't our method of saying, "stop being communist" better than the Russians' way of saying, "stop being democratic?" Remember, we will be out of Grenada, by Christmas. The Russians are still in Afghanistan, Poland, Czechoslovakia, etc.

The reason behind the tacky ads

Editor,
Your subtle pleas for help have finally gotten through. At first I must admit that the reasons for those "cheeky" (and tacky) ads escaped me, but now I think I understand. Perhaps your bill payments are in arrears, or perhaps, being understaffed, you are getting a little behind in your work.

Fear not. We hear your plaintive cries, and we'll get to the bottom of this, so you can now use your advertising space for something more appropriate.

Thanks to Susan Sedlacek and the residents of Van Zile Hall for letting us use the two empty rooms, for fin-

"Buy Ohio" for Christmas

CINCINNATI — Nearly a week after the kickoff of the 1983 Christmas shopping season, few would doubt that the nation is in for a merrier holiday than last year.

Thanksgiving weekend crowds at shopping malls and downtown department stores were generally hailed as the ultimate expression of long-overdue consumer confidence. Clerks reported first-day sales of 5 to 10 percent over receipts during the same period in 1982. "Happy shoppers, happy retailers," whistled Chicago's Sunday Tribune.

But, when all is bought and paid for, how merry will the season eventually prove? The jury is still out. Here in Ohio, where holiday crowds provoked a typical burst of optimism, a coalition of politicians, retailers and state agencies has announced a "Buy Ohio for Christmas" drive, encouraging shoppers to remember their fellow Ohioans this December. The special campaign betrays a certain uneasiness about the power of the Christmas dollar.

Initiated by Ohio's Democratic governor, Richard Celeste, the gimmick is to spur sales of local products such as "Buy American" campaigns do. A booklet listing Ohio-made goods has been printed and distributed to interested shoppers; retailers have been encouraged to feature Ohio products in seasonal sales and advertising; restaurants and hotels have been asked to display in windows and on doors an attractive "Buy Ohio" sticker, much like the once-ubiquitous Blue Eagle of Roosevelt's day. State officials stress that the campaign is inexpensive and, above all, voluntary.

If nothing else, Celeste's "Buy Ohio" pitch appeals to this state's justifiably high opinion of itself as a crucible of industry. Long before Americans looked to Silicon Valley, Calif., they learned that Akron rolled out tires and that Lorain, Youngstown and Cleveland forged steels. Though industrial jobs have fallen from a third to a quarter of all employment in Ohio since 1970, the region's self-image as "the foundry" is only grudgingly tarnished.

MAXWELL GLEN

Unfortunately, while residents in other states have taken signs of recovery since last January, many Ohioans can't point to signs of a lasting upturn in their backyards. Indeed, while the state's jobless rate has fallen from its high of over 15 percent in January, unemployment still stands at 11 percent (roughly the national average at the recession's deepest).

A similarly modest rebound can be seen in individual industry profiles; all-important machine tool orders, which rose 70 percent last month, remain less than half the level of early 1980. For Ohioans, economists' praise of a "leaner" recovery is euphemistic.

At times, in fact, the sense that "things at least aren't getting worse" can be fleeting. U.S. Steel told its Cuyahoga Works employees last week that the plant is likely to be permanently closed soon. Here in Cincinnati, many veteran employees of one of this city's most cautious firms, Procter & Gamble, fear the unenviable prospect of choosing between early retirement and indefinite layoff — without benefits — later.

Meanwhile, the promises of high technology and "reindustrialization" often elicit smirks here. Honda Motor Co.'s multimillion-dollar facility near Marysville turns out highly popular motorcycles and cars comprised of parts stamped, welded and imported from Japan. Mini-mills for highly-touted "special" steels have often found it more profitable to import raw ingots rather than buy them from depressed furnaces in the nearby Mahoning or Ohio Valleys.

It is against this backdrop that the "Buy Ohio" campaign must contend. John Mahoney, president of the Ohio Council of Retail Merchants and a supporter of the drive, told our reporter Michael Duffy, "It's kind of a psychological thing more than anything else. The governor wanted to do something upbeat. But we're a durable goods state, based largely on steel, which may never come back."

Of course, many Ohioans will probably "Buy Ohio" whenever possible. They'll wrap playing cards from Cincinnati, jams and jellies from Orville and slipper from Columbus. Some may bypass foreign makes to put a Dayton bicycle under the tree. Wags have even joked about the prospect of Christmas stockings bulging with Ohio coal.

But the question here, as perhaps in other states, isn't whether Christmas 1983 will be better than that of last year. The economy has risen from its nadir. Instead, beneath the promise of the season, Americans wonder whether the spirit of Christmases past — like that of 1970, 1975 and even 1980 — will ever return as the spirit of Christmases future.

Questions linger over Marine deaths

By The Associated Press

CHECKPOINT 76, Lebanon — The outpost known as Checkpoint 76, manned jointly by U.S. Marines and Lebanese army troops, lies just beyond the southeastern corner of the Marine perimeter.

It's an area when fighting erupts repeatedly between the Lebanese army and Druse militiamen.

The Marines, sent here to keep the peace, have often found themselves on the firing line. It happened again Sunday night. The result was eight Marines dead and two wounded.

On Monday, Brig. Gen. James Joy, commander of the Marine contingent in the multinational peacekeeping force, gave few details of the incident except to say the Marines were hit by a 120mm mortar during heavy fighting.

But Lebanese soldiers, civilians and Druse fighters in the area said the Marines died when a phosphorus shell, fired from the nearby town of Schweifat, crashed into their thinly protected position on the roof of a two-story house only 200 meters from Druse bunkers.

It is unclear who fired first. Lebanese soldiers at the checkpoint claimed the Druse began sniping at them shortly after sundown, and the troops returned fire.

But Druse fighters and an official of the Druse-led progressive Socialist Party in Schweifat maintained the battle began when Lebanese army troops at the checkpoint started shooting.

"It started off with sniping from down there," said Druse militiaman Abu Nar, pointing toward Checkpoint 76.

As the shooting escalated, he said, five Druse scouts crept in the darkness through an olive grove to a spot behind the checkpoint.

"They saw the Marines firing at us," the 17-year-old fighter said.

At a news conference Monday, Marine commanders did not say who they blamed for starting the battle, but noted that the more the Marines and Lebanese soldiers fired, the more the Druse shot back.

"Their initial firing escalated as we returned fire," said Lt. Col. Ray Smith of Jacksonville, N.C., the Marine battalion commander.

"They continued to fire essentially at their initial targets even though they escalated the volume of fire as they went along."

As the Marines at this checkpoint joined the fighting, Druse militiamen joined them with automatic rifle fire and rocket-propelled grenades. By 10 p.m., mortar shells were also falling around the checkpoint.

Only four Marines should have been on the rooftop post, which is protected by one layer of sandbags, officials said. The rest of the Marines were supposed to have been in better protected bunkers, but when the shooting started, the others apparently headed for the roof to help their comrades.

"The point I want to get across is that we had 10 good young Marines who moved out of their protective bunkers and into the fighting position because they felt it was the thing to do," said Smith.

One floor beneath the Marines, a Lebanese family crouched in terror as shells, grenades and automatic rifle fire soared around them.

After a shell struck the ground floor of the building, which houses a small food shop, one of the Marines climbed down off the roof and urged the family to head for the basement.

"We told them we can't go, it isn't safe," said Nawal Kady, wife of the building owner. "Then when it (the firing) eased, we went down."

About 15 minutes later, the fatal round slammed into the northeast corner of the roof. The shell exploded, ripping apart the protective sandbags and hurling shrapnel and phosphorus into the Marines.

"We heard loud screams of pain and cries, and they were shouting at

Congressmen relay plight of parents jailed in debate

By The Associated Press

LOUISVILLE, Neb. — An Idaho congressman is relaying to key officials in the Reagan administration the plight of seven men jailed in Cass County because of their alleged affiliation with a non-accredited Christian school, a group of ministers said Monday.

Spokesmen for the Ad Hoc Coalition of Nebraska Pastors for Religious Liberty, however, would not specify which officials in Washington Rep. George Hansen, R-Idaho, had contacted.

Hansen was in Louisville on Saturday to check on the status of the Faith Christian School and went to the county jail at Plattsmouth to visit the fathers of seven pupils.

At their news conference Monday, the ministers reiterated their intention to stay in Cass County until a resolution of the Christian schools controversy that is satisfactory to them can be reached.

Sarpy County District Judge Ronald Reagan, who is presiding in the case, ordered the men jailed for contempt last month when they refused to answer questions at a hearing. He scheduled the hearing to resume today.

Distinguished alumna dies Friday, leaves legacy of textbooks, honors

By The Collegian Staff

Bessie Brooks West, 93, professor emerita of institutional management and the woman for whom West Hall was named, died Friday in Chula Vista, Calif.

West was on the K-State faculty for 33 years, and as head of the Department of Institutional Management from 1928 to 1956 she pioneered instruction in the field.

She was a past president of the Kansas and American Dietetic Associations and co-author of two of the important books in her field: "Food Service in Institutions," the first college textbook in institutional management, and "Food for Fifty," an institutional food preparation book. Both books have been printed in several editions and are still used as college texts in institutional management and by food service management.

An endowed scholarship fund in her name has been established with the KSU Foundation.

West was honored in 1949 for superior achievement by Michigan State Normal College with an honorary master's of education degree; by the American Dietetics Association, which in 1960 presented her its Copher Award, the highest honor in the field of dietetics and by Phi Delta Gamma, national graduate women's professional organization, which presented her their first Achievement Award. Her honoraries included Phi Kappa Phi and Omicron Nu.

West was born Aug. 25, 1890 in Northville, Mich. She attended Michigan State Normal for three years and taught in high schools at Lind, Wash., and Mullin, Idaho before marrying Howard E. West in 1915.

Widowed in 1918 with a son, Major Gorton West, she resumed her schooling and earned a bachelor's degree in 1925 and a Master's in 1928 from the University of California, Berkeley, while teaching in the Berkeley secondary schools. She came to K-State in 1928 and retired in 1961.

She remained active in her profession by serving as acting head of the Department of Food Service at State University of New York, Cobleskill, in 1962-63 and as a visiting professor at Pennsylvania State University from 1963-65.

She is survived by her son, who lives in California, and by four grandchildren.

Reagan, Kohl talk to shuttle

By The Associated Press

SPACE CENTER, Houston — President Reagan and West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl talked with the six orbiting Spacelab astronauts Monday, and Reagan praised the mission as "a shining example of international cooperation at its best."

It was the first time leaders of two nations had talked with orbiting astronauts at the same time on a joint linkup. Reagan called the 14½-minute experience "one heck of a conference call."

Both leaders expressed hope the flight would lead to even more ambitious multinational space ventures in the future.

Reagan, speaking from the White House, said the united flight of the $1 billion European-built Spacelab and the U.S.-built shuttle Columbia was "demonstrating to the world that when people are free to work together there's nothing that can't be accomplished."

Kohl, speaking from Athens, Greece, where he is attending an economic conference, said the presence on Spacelab 1 of West German physicist Ulf Merbold "is an exceedingly happy circumstance." Kohl said he hopes that the future also will be characterized by such cooperation "on both sides of the Atlantic."

As the leaders spoke, live televised views of the astronauts were beamed to Earth and displayed at seven locations in Europe and the United States. Mission commander John Young was shown inside Spacelab with Merbold and with payload scientist Byron Lichtenberg. Another view showed the other three crewmen, Owen Garriott, Bob Parker and Brewster Shaw, in the middeck of Columbia.

Both Kohl and Reagan praised the scientific work aboard Spacelab and the president asked Young his views on the benefits of space.

"It is a place where humanity can live and work and make things better for people on Earth," Young replied.

In questions from European reporters, Merbold was asked what has impressed him most about his spaceflight. He quickly said in his native tongue: "Die Schönheit der Erde (the beauty of the Earth)."

"It is so beautiful," he said in German, "that one simply cannot describe it in words."

Young was asked how Merbold and Lichtenberg — neither a professional astronaut — had adapted to the mission.

"Ulf and Byron took to spaceflight just like ducks to water," Young said. "They are enjoying it just as much as we are. It is delightful up here."

Questions came from journalists in London, The Hague, Brussels, Bonn-Cologne, Geneva and Rome. American reporters talked with the Spacelab astronauts Thursday.

Gamma Phi alumnae battle bar's location

By The Collegian Staff

While the house corporation of the Gamma Phi Beta sorority and the Institute of Religion are represented by the same legal counsel, Dan Myers, the petition against Charlie's Neighborhood Bar by the Gamma Phi Beta sorority house, 1807 Todd Road, is based on concerns about property protection rather than moral issues.

The corporation, composed of the sorority's alumnae, is a separate body from the house's active chapter. Opinions of the alumnae and those of the current house members about the proposed new establishment do not necessarily correlate.

According to Lila Levin, chairman of the house corporation, the petition is based on the physical safety of the house, not necessarily the moral complaints stated by many nearby residents and the Institute of Religion.

"We are objecting to the probable amount of increased noise and parking problems," Levin said. "Our concern about the bar has to do with the protection of our property, not the moral issue."

The bar is located in the First Center, located at Claflin Road and Denison Avenue and directly behind the Gamma Phi Beta house. The Institute of Religion, owned and operated by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, is located near the bar also.

"The corporation board is responsible for the safety, upkeep and anything to do with the physical question of the house," Levin said. "It is not the responsibility of the active chapter."

Levin said the group's main objective has to do with late-night noise — the sorority's sleeping dorm faces the bar — and a possible parking problem, since a row of evergreen trees and bushes separates the bar's parking lot and the sorority's parking lot.

The bar wasn't a business the house corporation had anticipated would be there, Levin said.

Commission to consider bar's license

By The Collegian Staff

Charlie's Neighborhood Bar will once again be a topic of discussion tonight during the City Commission meeting.

The meeting is scheduled for 7 p.m. in the City Commission room, City Hall.

The bar, which will be located in the First Center, Claflin Road and Denison Avenue, created controversy when owner Charlie Busch applied for a cereal malt beverage license. Approval for this license will be considered again tonight.

Several factions of the community voiced disapproval of the bar during the Nov. 1 and Nov. 15 Commission meetings.

The bar was opposed by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which owns and operates the Institute of Religion. The institute is located within 200 feet of the bar. This could violate a city ordinance banning consumption of cereal malt beverages within 200 feet of a city or parochial school if the institute is defined by the Commission as a parochial school. This issue will also be considered at the meeting.

In addition to the church, several residents in the area oppose the opening of the bar.

The Commission will also consider an ordinance amending the cereal malt beverage licensing provisions in relation to public and private schools.

In other business, the city will discuss the Supplemental Memorandum of Agreement with Mel Roebuck, of Forest City Rental Properties Corp. Forest City is developer for the proposed downtown mall. The city recently received preliminary approval for a $10 million Urban Development Action Grant from the Department of Housing and Urban Development for the mall and downtown redevelopment. The supplemental agreement is required by HUD for final approval of the UDAG.

Commissioners will also consider an ordinance adopting a plan which would establish the Tax Increment Financing District.

Pilot ends bomb threat, catches man in cockpit

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — A pilot restrained a 22-year-old McPherson man in the cockpit of a plane that landed Sunday night in Wichita when the man placed a knapsack on the floor and said it contained a bomb, authorities said Monday.

John Brierly, chief of safety at Wichita Mid-Continent Airport, said no bomb was found and no one was injured.

The DC-9 jet, Continental Airlines Flight 418 from Denver, landed about 8:50 p.m. Sunday with some 80 passengers.

Brierly said a man left the line of departing passengers and approached the pilot, Capt. Bill Taft, who was seated in the cockpit. Also in the cockpit was the co-pilot, Capt. Kenneth W. Stillwagon.

"He (the suspect) told them not to move the bag until after he left. When they asked why not, he told them there was a bomb in it," Brierly said.

Taft grabbed the man and held him while Stillwagon called the control tower to report the incident, Brierly said. Airport security officers escorted the man and the two pilots off the plane.

The bag and plane were examined by the Wichita Police Department bomb squad, Brierly said. No bomb was found.

Leon Becker, city manager for Continental in Wichita, said the man never interfered with the passengers as they left the plane. He said the man surrendered without incident.

Brierly said the man was questioned by the FBI and taken by his father and grandfather, who also were on the flight, to a hospital near Newton for observation. He said the man offered no explanation to authorities.

Marines face 'open-ended' involvement in Middle East

Risk increases for Soviet opposition

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The growing violence in Lebanon, punctuated by the first clash between U.S. and Syrian forces last weekend, increases the risk of a confrontation with the Soviet Union in the Middle East.

The Reagan administration has asserted its determination to protect the 1,500 Marines hunkered down in the outskirts of Beirut, and the Soviets pledged to stand by Arab forces "who are fighting the Israeli and American aggression."

U.S. Marines are caught in the middle, a target for various groups in Lebanon that want to weaken President Amin Gemayel and give the United States a bloody nose.

Unless the latest show of U.S. force persuades Syria to reverse its policy and withdraw from Lebanon, the Marines' mission appears open-ended.

The Soviets, stung by the U.S. aerial strike against their Syrian allies, said Monday they would provide "moral and material" support to those opposing the United States and Israel. A Kremlin spokesman called the U.S. bombings against Syrian artillery and anti-aircraft positions "a new factor of aggression" in the Middle East.

President Reagan insisted Sunday that the United States was not spoiling for a fight with Syria, but sought only to help the Gemayel government stabilize Lebanon and to defend U.S. forces against attack.

Although Reagan emphasized that "we don't desire" a broader confrontation with Syria, and that the bombings were in response to an "unprovoked attack" on unarmed U.S. reconnaissance planes Saturday — the show of American muscle could prove ominous.

On the diplomatic front, the United States informed the U.N. Security Council that the attack on the Syrian positions was "a discrete measure taken in self-defense." White House spokesman Larry Speakes said the U.S. Embassy in Damascus had made unspecified "additional diplomatic representations" to Syria.

Syria is armed by the Soviet Union, and its gunners are trained by Soviet advisers. U.S. firing on Syrian positions, which Reagan and Defense Department officials suggested might be repeated, brings the superpowers closer to a clash in the Middle East than at any time since the Yom Kippur war of 1973.

The Soviets rebuilt Syrian forces after they were humbled by the Israelis in Lebanon last year. The Soviets supplied them with 800 to 900 T-52 tanks, more than 450 combat jet planes and four batteries of surface-to-air missiles near Damascus and at Homs in northern Syria.

No fewer than 7,000 Soviet technicians and other support personnel are in Syria, according to Israeli estimates. The Reagan administration places the figure closer to 9,000.

Analysis

In Lebanon, about 100 Soviet military advisers are serving alongside the Syrians.

So far, the Soviets have avoided direct combat involvement. But if the Syrians are subjected to continued U.S. poundings, the Soviets may be forced to choose whether to abandon their closest Arab ally or to join the fray.

At a Kremlin news conference Monday, government spokesman Leonid Zamyatin said "the Arab countries will take the measures necessary" and the Soviet Union "will support those who are fighting the Israeli and American aggression."

For his part, Reagan said Sunday that the Marines, sent to Lebanon 16 months ago to help evacuate Palestinian guerrillas after an Israeli siege of Beirut, will stay there "to bring peace to that area."

But with peace still extremely elusive, the Marines are likely to remain an inviting target for attacks that could draw the United States into repeated acts of retaliation.

"We are going to defend our forces there," Reagan said.

"We are not at war with the United States," said Rafic Jouejati, the Syrian ambassador to Washington. "But the escalation is imposed on us, and what are we supposed to win by that? We want to defend ourselves, to defend our positions, to defend the independence and the sovereignty of Lebanon."

U.S.-Syrian hostility can be traced to the troop withdrawal agreement that the administration helped arrange last summer with considerable effort. Under the accord, Israel promised to withdraw its 15,000 troops from Lebanon, contingent on the pullout of the 40,000 Syrian troops who control about half the country. But the Syrians refused to budge.

In the violence that followed Israel's evacuation from the Chouf mountains southeast of Beirut in early September, the Marines suffered casualties and responded by shelling Druse positions.

Then, when the terrorist bombing of Marines headquarters in Beirut killed 239 U.S. military personnel on Oct. 23, U.S. officials blamed a pro-Iranian faction and the Syrians. Two weeks ago, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger accused the Syrian government of "sponsorship and knowledge" of the attack.

Meantime, the administration has closed ranks with Israel. Reagan and visiting Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir last week established a commission to plan joint military maneuvers.

In the past, the United States and the Soviet Union have kept at arm's length from each other in the Middle East, but a confrontation loomed twice in the past 13 years.

In 1970, during an undeclared war between Israel and Egypt, then a Soviet client, Israeli warplanes shot down five Soviet MiG-21 fighters that were defending Egypt. The Soviets held their fire.

In 1973, while Israel was rebounding from a joint attack by Egypt and Syria, the Soviets suggested they might intervene militarily. The Nixon administration, which had replenished Israel's stock of arms, put U.S. forces on alert. Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger also arranged a cease-fire before Israel could attack the Egyptian army and test the Soviets' intentions.

Shultz calls U.S. objective peaceful

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State George Shultz said Monday the use of American airpower against Syrian targets in Lebanon does not foreshadow an American effort to impose a military solution to that country's problems.

At a news conference, Shultz sought to portray the American air strike Sunday as an isolated incident which does not represent an escalation of the conflict there.

At the same time, he called on the Soviet Union to use its influence with Syria to moderate that country's policies.

"We urge the Soviets to urge the Syrians to look on Lebanon in a sensible way," Shultz said.

Emphasizing the U.S. intention to seek a diplomatic solution in Lebanon, Shultz said special U.S. envoy Donald Rumsfeld will return to the region this morning.

Shultz, speaking on the eve of a 10-day visit to Europe and North Africa, did not rule out the possibility of additional air strikes in Lebanon, but said he preferred not to discuss tactical questions.

He said American objectives in Lebanon remain the same: the creation of a broadly-based government in Lebanon and removal of all foreign forces from that country.

"We intend to see this through with the government of Lebanon," he said.

He said Sunday's air strike was an exercise of the U.S. right to self-defense, asserting that it was in response to Syrian anti-aircraft fire against unarmed American reconnaissance planes late last week. For more than two months, the United States had flown those missions over Lebanon without encountering enemy fire, he said.

He said the United States was acting on "conclusive evidence" that Syrian forces were responsible for the attacks on the American planes.

Shultz said that despite serious difficulties, Lebanon has made "considerable progress" in achieving the capability to control its own destiny. He cited in particular Lebanon's efforts to build a viable defense force.

He added that following the visits last week of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir and Lebanese President Amin Gemayel last week, "some concrete steps" were set in motion for dealing with the Lebanese problem.

Jumper's death saves four friends

WINTERS, Calif. — A parachute instructor and master jumper whose reserve chute became entangled in an airplane's tail leaped to his death to save his jumping companions, authorities said.

George Morar, 59, died Sunday after he jumped from a plane hurtling earthward because his partially opened parachute was tangling the aircraft's tail, said Yolo County sheriff's spokesman Dennis Winger.

"He gave his life to save the others," Winger said.

Morar had nearly 3,000 jumps to his credit and was nationally known as a master jumper and a teacher, said a spokesman for the United States Parachute Association. Morar owned a jumping school based at the Yolo County Airport.

Winger and four others were in the plane that took off from the field at Woodland on Sunday afternoon.

Morar was sitting next to one of the open doors as the aircraft climbed, Winger said. At about 5,700 feet, Morar's reserve parachute suddenly opened, was sucked out the doorway and became entangled in the tail, Winger said.

That sent the plane into a dive. The other three parachutists struggled to free Morar until the plane had fallen to 3,000 feet and was threatening to stall.

Morar then jumped. His main chute failed to fully open and his body was found northwest of Winters, about 60 miles northeast of San Francisco, Winger said.

Senator's shuttle call goes unheard

WASHINGTON — Despite a boost from a building, Sen. Barry M. Goldwater had no luck Monday trying to communicate by ham radio with space shuttle astronaut Owen Garriot.

The Arizona Republican, a veteran ham operator, called on a special frequency for about 10 minutes but got no answer from the orbiting spacecraft Columbia.

Goldwater used a 150-watt transmitter on the two meter band and a homemade cross dipole antenna set up on the copper-covered roof of the Russell Senate Office Building.

Getting no answer from Garriot, the senator explained to reporters gathered for the event: "This happens all of the time. It's one of the unfortunate habits of amateur radio."

At one point as he fiddled with the dials on the ham rig, Goldwater joked, "I don't think he's up there."

Rock star leaps off concert stage

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. — A member of the Temptations rock group, Richard Street, was arrested after bounding from the stage during a concert in an apparent attempt to elude police.

Street, 41, and another man left the Grand Center stage Sunday night, halfway through an encore performance of "Higher and Higher" at the close of their second and final show.

Officers had intended to serve a civil bench warrant from Kalamazoo at the conclusion of the second show accusing Street of failure to make support payments, Police Lt. Victor Gillis said.

However, he said Street apparently learned of the plan, jumped from the stage and ran for the exit. With him, running interference, was a man believed to be his bodyguard.

The bodyguard stopped at the base of some stairs in an apparent attempt to detain police, collided with an officer and both tumbled to the floor, Gillis said. He said Street then called off the guard.

Street, Beverly Hills, Calif., spent the night in Kent County Jail awaiting transfer to Kalamazoo County, the lieutenant said.

The guard, whose name was withheld pending arraignment, was arrested for hindering and opposing a police officer and released after posting $100 bond, Gillis said.

Democrats blast interest ceiling hike

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Four Democratic members of a legislative study committee have issued a dissenting report against a proposal to raise the interest rate ceiling to 30 percent, saying there is "no concrete evidence" to justify the measure.

"In the world of consumer credit, legal maximums in the statute books soon become minimums for consumers on main street," the Democratic report stated. "Absent compelling evidence that 30 percent maximums are both needed and desirable, we cannot, in good conscience, support such sweeping increases."

The report was prepared by Sens. Paul Feleciano, Wichita, and Gerald Karr, Emporia, and Reps. Ken Francisco, Maize, and Charles Laird, Topeka. It will be submitted to the 1984 Legislature as a "minority report" to a recommendation by the Special Committee on Commercial and Financial Institutions.

The panel endorsed a proposal last month to overhaul the state's law regulating interest rates, raising the maximum to 30 percent on consumer loans and credit transactions of less than $10,000. Current maximums range from 21 percent to 36 percent.

For loans greater than $10,000, the committee's bill would eliminate government regulation of interest ceilings and allow the market to set the rate. The measure, which is designed to simply the interest rate law, will be introduced in the next session of the Legislature, which convenes Jan. 9.

The four legislators who prepared the dissenting report were the only Democrats on the 10-member interim committee, and they complained that no consumers testified before the panel in support of the higher interest rates.

"Instead, the committee heard a long litany of justifications and arguments from 'experts' paid one way or another by creditors who collect interest, not consumers who pay it," the Democratic report stated.

Finally, the four Democrats objected that the measure was a way for lawmakers to "begin the process of interest rate deregulation."

"Again, where is a single shred of evidence that the consumers of Kansas want, desire or support interest rate deregulation? Frankly, there isn't any evidence," the report stated.

Currently, the maximum interest rate on consumer loans or credit is either 21 percent or set by a three-tier system: 36 percent on credit transactions less than $540, 21 percent on amounts between $540 and $1,800, and 18 percent on amounts more than $1,800.

The four Democrats also contend that the economy does not justify higher interest ceilings. They noted that the prime interest rate currently is about the same as it was in 1974, when inflation was about 11 percent and consumer interest rates were 18-21 percent.

"Inflation is now pegged at 3.3 percent, less than one-third the 1974 rate, and Kansas interest rate ceilings have been nudged upwards to allow 21 percent maximums across the board," the Democratic report stated.

"These are the economic facts, and they say one thing clearly: Interest rates are high enough already."

Familiar voice presents 'Cats

By SEAN REILLY
Sports Editor

"Ladies and gentlemen, your attention please...here come the 'Cats!" This is the customary fashion Dev Nelson uses to introduce the K-State basketball team as they come from the locker room onto the court at each home game.

Although he has been the public announcer for the basketball team for just two years, Wildcat fans easily recognize his voice as the "Voice of K-State."

He is currently working for KSAC radio as the extension radio-TV specialist. Nelson's job includes covering stories relating to environmental issues, features (Voices of Kansas) and handling sports and unusual sports features for the K-State Radio Network.

Nelson first came to K-State in 1946 as a student majoring in radio-speech. He received his degree in the summer of 1949 and immediately began work for a commercial radio station, KFOR, in Lincoln, Neb.

In 1954 he returned to K-State to work for the K-State sports network, which had been started a few years earlier by Bob Hilgendorf.

Nelson did not remain at K-State long. In 1956, he was hired by WIBW as the sports director for both the television and radio. It was his first full-time job. During the 10 years that he worked there, Nelson said he did everything from covering local high-school sports to covering K-State, the University of Kansas, Emporia State University and Washburn University sports activities.

"I worked all the time and I loved it," Nelson said.

In 1967, Nelson left WIBW and returned for good to K-State, this time to become sports information director.

In 1974, Nelson was forced to give up his responsibilities at the sports information office because of surgery — a 12-hour double bypass. After recuperating, he began his current job at KSAC.

When asked how the label "Voice of K-State" came about, Nelson smiled and said, "I was doing that (announcing) for a long time. I guess it's like a pair of old shoes or old worn out coat."

"I just kept in touch with K-State. When I was sports information director, I became involved as much as possible," Nelson said.

Nelson's involvement with K-State's play-by-play ended three years ago when K-State sold its broadcasting rights exclusively to WIBW. As a result, Nelson was no longer the play-by-play announcer for the 'Cats.

"Earlier, K-State was selling the game rights for a very nominal fee. It was a non-profit situation. K-State was the last hold out for universities who did it this way," Nelson said. "That was the way most universities did it in the 1950s."

In his 25 years of announcing the games, Nelson said he missed only four games.

"I missed one when I had the flu and I missed the others in 1964 when K-State played UCLA in the Final Four," he said.

Nelson missed the Final Four tournament when his car spun off a bridge due to ice. He was returning to Topeka from Manhattan after covering a high-school basketball game.

Having been associated with K-State for so long, Nelson said he really doesn't think of himself as an ambassador for the University.

"People identify me with the school because of my association or longevity with the school," Nelson said. "When I travel around the state for appearances, people still associate me with the school. I think it's an asset. I feel like an ambassador in a small way."

Nelson said he has spoken in most towns in Kansas, and in that time he was either a master of ceremonies or director of sports information.

Most sports fans who have viewed a sport for a certain length of time think of themselves as experts on the subject. Nelson said that times, attitudes and methods have changed since he first started at K-State.

"I guess I am from the old school. I feel like an expert from the standpoint that it has been a big part of my life," he said. "In the modern era of Dickey, Coffman, Blackman and Evans I have had to make adjustments."

Nelson added that he would like to remain as the announcer for K-State.

"I would like to keep it. I certainly would hate to turn it off completely," he said.

What about the best teams he has viewed while associated with K-State?

Without hesitation, Nelson recalled the 1969 football team coached by Vince Gibson.

"That was the year they beat Oklahoma 59-21. They were an exceptional team," he said.

Basketball was another story though. Nelson said there was so many of them (good teams) during his involvement with K-State basketball.

"The 1958 team was great. They went to the Final Four in Louisville, Ky. They had greats like Bob Boozer, Jack Parr, Wally Frank, Roy Dewitz, and Hayden Abbott," he said.

"Among Hartman's best team was the 1977 team that went to the Final Four. That team had greats like Scott Langton, Curtis Redding, Larry Dassie, Darryl Winston and Mike Evans. It was an exceptional team also."

"Those are the two teams I distinctly remember."

Nelson said the greatest satisfaction of his former jobs is that they gave him the opportunity to travel throughout Kansas.

"My jobs enabled me to get to know and meet so many people in the state," he said. "Wherever you go, you don't feel like a complete stranger."

Two Royals enter prison; Blue awaits trial

By The Associated Press

FORT WORTH, Texas — Kansas City Royals baseball players Willie Wilson and Jerry Martin reported to federal prison Monday to begin serving their three-month sentences for attempting to possess cocaine.

Wilson, 28, the 1982 American League batting champion, and Martin, 34, who missed nearly all of the 1983 season with a hand injury, are among four Kansas City ballplayers who pleaded guilty to drug charges in October.

Willie Aikens, 29, who is undergoing treatment in Baltimore for drug abuse, is scheduled to begin his three-month term on the same charge Jan. 3. Former Cy Young Award winner Vida Blue, 34, is scheduled to appear in U.S. District Court in Kansas City, Kan., for sentencing Dec. 15 on a charge of possessing three grams of cocaine.

Dolores Nisle, a spokesman at the Fort Worth prison, said Martin arrived at the facility at about 10:30 a.m. Wilson reported about 25 minutes later.

Blue and Martin have been released by the Royals, and Aikens was told he would be traded or released. Baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn has said he would make a statement Dec. 15 on any disciplinary action against the players by baseball.

"Willie (Wilson) is very depressed, and obviously he's extremely down," Wilson's agent, Jack Sands, said over the weekend.

William Simpson, Martin's lawyer, said Martin "is extremely unhappy that he brought himself to this point."

"He has a 7-year-old boy and a 6-year-old boy. He's going to be in jail rather than at home for Christmas. How disruptive do you think that could be? There's no number large enough to describe it," Simpson said.

Wilson, Aikens and Martin were sentenced to one year each and fined, but U.S. Magistrate J. Milton Sullivan suspended all but three months of the prison sentences. He recommended that the terms be spent in the drug rehabilitation program at Fort Worth.

The investigation into the players' involvement reportedly started after calls were made to a residence in suburban Johnson County, Kan., seeking to purchase cocaine.

A federal grand jury returned drug indictments Oct. 18 against 12 people after the four ballplayers and a fifth man, who were not indicted, entered guilty pleas to the federal charges.

At the Fort Worth facility, there are no guard towers, high stone walls or cell doors.

"We're essentially a first-offender-type population," says warden Dudley Blevins. Blevins says the facility is for white-collar, short-term and non-violent offenders but does not have "the country-club atmosphere that people like to play it up to be."

"There are rules and regulations, and inmates are accountable. The pressures are different. Here an inmate doesn't have to worry about physical well-being or being assaulted. But there is a confinement period. They are away from family and community. The removal from society and the community is still here; that's one of the things the people who talk about country club don't understand," Blevins says.

Male prisoners are housed in one of three units: alcohol, where 136 inmates live in what is known as the Freedom Unit; comprehensive health, where 151 inmates with medical handicaps are housed, or a drug unit known as STAR (Steps Toward Addiction Recovery), which houses 170 inmates and is the largest of the prison's five units. Wilson, Martin and Aikens will be housed in the STAR unit.

The players will own a registration number, eight identifying digits that will be theirs forever. They will wear their own clothes, as do nearly all the inmates, and are allowed to carry up to $10.

Home will be a room about 7-by-9 feet, furnished with a bed, desk, chair and wall locker. At 6 a.m., 4 p.m. and 10:30 p.m., inmates must be "in your room and remain until (head) count is clear," according to the written rules of the STAR unit.

Testing or previous work history or both will determine where the players work in prison. Prison pay ranges from 17 to 39 cents an hour, and job performance can lead to as much as three days a month of sentence reduction.

Sanction regulations

Praise the National Collegiate Athletic Association in its administration of punishment of the University of Kansas for violating rules and regulations.

The NCAA, which is not too popular among some collegiate athletic departments because of television rights dispute, has just proven its inability to justifiably prove its existence and logic, possibly losing more supporters.

Just last week the NCAA handed down a decision regarding certain violations committed by the Jayhawks, but those penalties were not sufficient in punishing or deterring them, or anyone else for that matter.

The two-year probation handed down on the Jayhawks was the result of 34 rule violations ranging from the alleged offering of $30,000 to a player, to clothing, transportation and gift certificates.

The penalties includes a one-year ban from television and bowl games in the 1984 season. The second year is essentially a year on probation without any sanctions.

However, another penalty was levied against the unnamed KU football assistant coach, refraining him from any type of activity with the Jayhawks' program for the next three years.

Seriously folks, who's the NCAA trying to slip one by?

How about a little bit of history concerning K-State when they violated the NCAA rules, violations I believe to be of lesser severity compared to Kansas.

In 1978, the NCAA placed K-State on probation, with penalties ranging from reduction of grant-in-aid (scholarships) to an estimated $300,000 loss in revenue.

The probation against K-State was set for an indefinite period of time without eligibility for post-season competition or appearances on the NCAA-controlled television network during the 1978-79 seasons.

Other penalties were the reduction of the number of scholarships by a total of 13 during the 1978-79 season, four the following season, and by three in the 1980-81. This was in response to K-State handing out 43 football scholarships in a year when the most allowed by NCAA rules is 30.

K-State had nothing to lose then with post-season competition or appearances when noting its losing tradition of four decades.

"Kansas State University tried to circumvent the rules and in essence tried to obtain an entire recruiting class," Charles M. Neinas, former Big Eight commissioner of the NCAA, said.

This was the first time the Big Eight Conference had ever deprived a member school of revenue distributed from the conference of fice. It had been termed the harshest penalty ever to be administered to a major college football program.

SEAN REILLY
Sports Editor

In May of 1980, K-State was taken off probation by the league, but the sanctions still were in effect.

Dick Towers, K-State athletic director, remarked on the sanctions leveled against KU. "In no way can I feel that the Kansas athletic program is going to be hurt in any way, shape or form by the actions of the NCAA."

"I feel everyone wasted a lot of time and money over the last 19 months and made K-State look mighty foolish in turning them in in the first place. I have to agree with their players. It's not a big deal."

Even K-State Head Football Coach Jim Dickey states his disapproval of the ruling. "Why does the NCAA camouflage it saying it's a two-year probation? That questions your intelligence. That's the thing I don't like about it."

What even concerned Dickey more than the penalties assessed against Kansas, was the penalties that have or have not been placed upon schools for violations.

Schools such as Oklahoma State and more recently, Miami of Florida have been guilty of recruiting violations. However, penalties were anything but harsh.

The 19 months that Towers speaks of is the time period needed to investigate the allegations into the violations by Kansas.

Last year after the college basketball season had ended, Notre Dame head basketball coach Digger Phelps stated that there were many recruiting violations occurring in collegiate athletics.

Phelps was hoping for and eventually sparked an investigation in the sports world for these violations. Despite the fact the committee was unable to discover any violations, I wonder what would have happened if such situations were found to be true.

Is the NCAA actually trying to punish the Jayhawks or is it merely indicating to the world of college athletics that future violations are to be met with less and less punishment for violating rules and regulations?

Free tickets help draw fans to women's basketball games

By TIM FILBY
Collegian Reporter

Student senators are receiving a chance to see one of the top women basketball teams in the country for free all season since Coach Lynn Hickey distributed 60 season tickets at last week's Student Senate meeting.

"We're getting out and trying to get more people to come to the games, and free tickets is one way to bring them in," Dick Towers, athletic director, said.

The giving away of basketball tickets is just one of several promotions designed to boost attendance at women's basketball games, Towers said. Other promotions this season include special halftime events at games, special group ticket prices for senior citizens and high-school students and door prizes.

Hickey said she gives tickets to many groups besides senate.

"At almost every appearance I make I try to give out tickets," Hickey said. "This year, I have given out tickets to a number of groups. At a K-State Social Club meeting this year we gave away 250 free admission passes."

The tickets were given to senate because it is an influential group on campus, Hickey said.

"They're an organization that puts in a lot of time and effort and have some influence," Hickey said. "We're hoping if we give someone a ticket, then they'll bring someone else or tell them about the game. I think that with as strong as our program is, we'll impress people after they see us."

Hickey said this was the second year that she has given away season tickets to senate. Hickey said she had no way of knowing if the ticket giveaway was a success last season, but she said she felt the free tickets might have been a factor in improved attendance.

Community support has been good for the team, Hickey said, but she is looking for a better turnout from the student population.

"We've had good community support by young families and older people, but we don't have good student support," Hickey said. "I really don't know what the key to that would be. We've won big, we're the Big Eight champs, and we've had good publicity."

Although giving away free tickets is a good promotion, Hickey said it shouldn't be overused.

"There is a thin line between promotion and begging," Hickey said. "We just have to make sure we stay on the right side of the line."

Honduras denies 92 churchwomen entry to protest U.S. involvement

By The Associated Press

TEGUCIGALPA, Honduras — The government denied entry Monday to 92 American churchwomen who planned a three-day protest against maneuvers here by thousands of American soldiers.

"The arrival of these people was being supported by leftist extremists who reside in our country for the purpose of subverting order in Honduras," said Amilcar Santamaria, the government press spokesman.

"The government of President Roberto Suazo Cordova prohibited the entry of these ladies because they possess tourist visas and because our constitution does not permit foreigners to become involved in domestic political activities."

The women arrived on a commercial flight from Miami. Only 10 people, none from the religious group, were allowed off the plane. Santamaria said it flew later to San Pedro Sula, Honduras, for refueling before returning to the United States.

Earlier, Santamaria said about 100 other women were on a flight from New Orleans. He said later that the plane had not arrived in Tegucigalpa.

Military helicopters clattered back and forth over the Tegucigalpa airport, and military police kept journalists from entering.

An organizer of the protest said Saturday in Tegucigalpa that both Roman Catholic nuns and Protestant churchwomen were planning to participate.

"We are united in our concern over the possibility of a war between Nicaragua and Honduras," said Maria Barron, a nun from San Jose, Calif.

"Our action is sponsored by thousands of women from our country, with the idea of protesting the U.S. intervention in Central America and calling on God to keep this region from blowing up in a conflict of unimaginable proportions."

Santamaria told The Associated Press, "Our government supports the Honduran Catholic Church, which last week disavowed those protests by foreigners, through the Episcopal Conference, presided over by Monsignor Hector Enrique Santos, archbishop of Tegucigalpa."

The American churchwomen planned to conduct public vigils and prayer sessions in Tegucigalpa and in Comayagua and Choluteca, both sites of American military camps.

At least 3,000 American soldiers are in Honduras taking part in extended military maneuvers intended to make clear to the leftist Sandinista government in neighboring Nicaragua that the United States will not tolerate the spread of Marxist revolution through the region.

Rezoning may allow new greek housing

By The Collegian Staff

The Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board voted unanimously, 4-0, to recommend to the City Commission the rezoning of the area between Elaine Road and Jardine Terrace Apartments.

The section of land was previously a trailer park and, according to Dave Weaver, property manager of the KSU Foundation, the land is wanted for greek housing.

Larry Hulse, chief city planner, said that according to the 1968 land-use plan, the area north of Todd Road was designed to be low-density housing, which refers to residential housing. But, Hulse said, the use of the land since then has not been reflective of that plan, as the presence of three sorority houses on Todd Road and the trailer park have proved.

Weaver said that to give the proposed houses ample room, the area would probably only have space for two greek houses. Currently, the Sigma Sigma Sigma sorority and the Phi Kappa Tau fraternity are planning to build houses in area.

"To provide 100 percent offstreet parking and enough area around the buildings for activities and expansion, there would probably only be room for two," Weaver said.

The board also voted 4-0 to amend the 1968 land-use plan to change the area from low-density to high-density, excluding the area on Elaine Drive which lies between Todd Road and the proposed site for the greek houses. The board excluded Elaine Drive until residents there have the opportunity to voice their opinion of the amendment.

Court backs Williams' conviction

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA — The Georgia Supreme Court on Monday upheld the murder convictions and consecutive life sentences given Wayne B. Williams in 1982 for the slayings of two of 29 young blacks whose deaths were investigated by a special police task force.

The seven-member court unanimously rejected a defense challenge to the prosecution's use of evidence from 10 slayings in which Williams was not charged. Prosecutors charged that the cases established a pattern.

The court also rejected a contention that the state failed to demonstrate the scientific reliability of comparisons of tiny fibers found in Williams' home and car and on the bodies of the victims.

The court also rejected 32 other alleged trial court errors in its 81-page opinion, written by Justice Richard Bell. All members of the court joined in the opinion, except Justice George T. Smith, who concurred in the judgment only.

Williams, 25, was convicted in February 1982 of two counts of murder in the slayings of Nathaniel Cater, 27, and Jimmy Ray Payne, 21, two of 29 young blacks whose deaths during a 22-month period were investigated by a special police task force.

After he was sentenced to two consecutive life terms, Atlanta-area authorities publicly blamed the young black man for 22 of the other slayings, although he never was charged in any of those cases.

Williams maintained his innocence throughout his sensational nine-week trial, telling Judge Clarence Cooper just before he was sentenced, "I hope the person or persons who committed these crimes can be brought to justice. I did not do this."

Since the trial, he has been housed in an isolation cell at the Fulton County jail, meeting only with his parents, lawyers and a minister. Fulton County Sheriff Leroy Stynchcombe has refused to allow Williams to grant any interviews to reporters.

Williams first came to the attention of authorities on May 22, 1981, when he was stopped by police near the Jackson Parkway Bridge over the Chattahoochee River. Authorities had stationed stake-out teams at Atlanta-area bridges a month earlier after the bodies of the victims began appearing in area rivers.

Want To Sell Your Books ?

Question: How does the Union Bookstore determine how much your books are worth when you sell them back?

Answer: If the Bookstore has notification from the instructor that the books are to be re-adopted for use the next semester, and if the Bookstore does not already have a sufficient stock on hand, then you will be offered 60% of the publisher's current list price.

For example: if a book sells for $10 new and it meets the requirements noted above, the book would be bought from you for $6.

If the Bookstore has not received notice that the book will be used again, or if it already has a sufficient stock on hand, the book would be worth the current wholesale price as indicated by one of the nation's largest jobbers of used textbooks.

If you have any questions about the price being paid for a textbook, the buyer will be happy to answer any questions which you may have regarding the price paid.

Question: Is 60% the usual price paid for textbooks around the country?

Answer: Definitely not. Most stores in the United States pay only 50% for books being used again. The Union Bookstore is one of the few stores which pays 60%. And remember, we pay cash. You don't have to take your money out in trade.

Question: What about paperbacks? Does the 60% policy apply to them too?

Answer: Yes. The Union Bookstore does not penalize you on paperbacks. If they are being used again, and if the bookstore needs them, you will receive 60% of the publisher's list price.

Question: If the publisher's price has gone up since I bought my books, will I receive the benefit of that price increase?

Answer: Yes. For instance, if you bought your book for $9 and the publisher's list price is now $10, you will get $6, not $5.40.

GOP issues warning against defense hike

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — House Republican Leader Robert H. Michel has cautioned President Reagan against asking Congress for a 22 percent military spending increase that Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger has discussed with some legislators. Michel said such a boost "is not achievable" and could wreck any chance of reaching a bipartisan budget compromise next year.

In a letter delivered to the White House Monday evening, Michel, R-Ill., also sought Reagan's support for a move to give the president limited authority to withhold money that Congress has voted to spend. In addition, he asked for more congressional input on the budget the president will send to Capitol Hill at the end of January.

Michel's letter, a copy of which was obtained Tuesday by the Associated Press, is part of a delicate game that is played annually when the administration is preparing its budget request to Congress. Trial balloons are lofted from various federal agencies and legislators shoot down those ideas they dislike.

"I would like to see the Congress pass a budget next year that is realistic and achievable," Michel wrote to Reagan. "The Congress made a mockery of the budget process this year with a budget package that we all knew was not credible and could not be implemented."

Michel said he hoped that Congress would be more responsible next year, "and that your administration would do its share by submitting recommendations that are achievable."

The Illinois Republican reflected his frustration over the fact that for the past two years Reagan has sent Congress budgets which won virtually no support and splintered Republicans.

Aides said Michel will seek a meeting with White House officials to discuss next year's budget.

Last week, the defense secretary met privately with Senate Republican leaders and told them he is seeking a $305 billion Pentagon budget for next year, a 22 percent increase over current spending.

"A 22 percent increase in defense (spending) authority is not achievable and would only serve to aggravate any attempt to work a (budget) compromise in Congress," Michel said.

Election ends Farm Bureau shake-up

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gerald E. Lawrence, who operates a 700-acre small grain farm just west of Winfield, was elected Tuesday to a two-year term as vice president of the Kansas Farm Bureau.

Lawrence's election, to replace Doyle Rahjes of Agra who was elevated to president after John Junior Armstrong resigned last month, highlighted the final session of the annual meeting of the Farm Bureau, which also adopted educational policies for the first time in its 65-year history.

Those policies are far less aggressive than had been recommended by the organization's resolutions committee, but still represent a major step for the state Farm Bureau which over the years has been criticized by some Kansas teachers for not taking stands on education issues.

Lawrence was elected vice president over three rivals for the post — Robert L. Huser from Syracuse, who finished second in the balloting; Stanley Dreher Jr. from Iola, who was third, and Gilbert Rundell from Stafford.

It took three ballots to pick Lawrence under KFB bylaws, which require a majority vote for election. None of the votes was revealed.

Rahjes moved up from vice president to president in November after Armstrong, Muscotah, who had headed the state's largest farm organization since 1972, resigned

School policy makes history

under pressure and later decided to drop off the KFB's board of directors as well.

Armstrong attended the convention, mingled with his former colleagues and a resolution was adopted without dissent making him an honorary member of the board. Rahjes said that would entitle Armstrong to receive all communications of the board and sit in on meetings, but won't allow him to vote.

Newsmen attending a news conference held by Rahjes and Lawrence after the convention ended focused on the Armstrong removal, but Rahjes was cryptic in his responses.

"I'm just going to say we had a good convention," said the new president, who had served as vice president under Armstrong for 10 years.

"John Junior Armstrong was here, we have seen the delegates talking to him, it was friendly and he was made an honorary member of the board," added Rahjes.

"From this point onward he will be a respected past president of the Kansas Farm Bureau."

Asked if he foresaw any problem in Armstrong's being made an honorary member of the KFB board and having permission to attend meetings and speak his piece, Rahjes replied, "Absolutely not."

Rahjes said he expects Lawrence, now the No. 2 man in the Farm Bureau, to be "a fine vice president" and said he looks forward to working with him.

Lawrence pledged, "We're going to make Kansas Farm Bureau go forward to the very best of our abilities."

He is a graduate of Kansas State University who served two years as an Army infantry officer, including 13 months in Korea. He first was elected to the Cowley County Farm Bureau board in 1954 and has been active in bureau affairs since that time. He was named district leader of the year in 1961.

Lawrence has served on the state KFB board of directors since 1968 and is a member of its executive committee.

Rahjes will serve the second year of Armstrong's most recent two-year term, and will be eligible to retain that post at next year's convention, which will be held Dec. 2-4 at the Broadview Hotel in Wichita — first time it has been held outside Topeka in years.

The KFB resolutions committee recommended a policy statement on education which included endorsement of a merit pay system for Kansas teachers and school administrators with student competency test results to be used as the basis for deciding who got the extra pay.

However, the delegates rejected that portion of the resolution during floor debate and removed all reference to merit pay from the policy statement.

The original resolution also recommended increasing the number of days Kansas pupils attend school above the present 180, tougher entrance requirements for students entering teacher education and tougher high school graduation requirements.

None of those things made it through debate and into the final version of the resolution, however.

The statement does put the Farm Bureau on record as supporting "adequately increased" salaries for classroom teachers; continuing the state's competency testing program; reducing the number of school administrators; implementing tougher college graduation requirements for students of teacher education; reviewing teacher certification requirements, and reducing extra-curricular activities for students.

On other education issues, the convention recommended enactment of a statewide local income tax to support schools; abolishing teacher tenure; merging vocational-technical schools and community junior colleges "within reasonable geographic guidelines," and opposing mediation or arbitration to resolve school board-teacher contract disputes.

An Alta Vista resident walks through the rubble of two buildings which were engulfed by fire late Monday night and early Tuesday morning. Several businesses housed in the buildings were destroyed after a wood-burning stove ignited while being stoked.

Blaze destroys three buildings in Alta Vista

By LAURI DIEHL
Collegian Reporter

A fire Monday night in Alta Vista destroyed one building, then rekindled and destroyed two more after firemen had left the scene.

Warren Hoch, Alta Vista fire chief, said the fire started in the late afternoon and was caused by a wood furnace in one of the buildings.

"The fire broke out around 5 p.m., and we thought we had it under control by 8:30 p.m.," Hoch said. "Ted Jones, the father of the man who owned two of the buildings, was firing up the furnace. The fire broke out again in the second building around 11 p.m."

Jones was treated for smoke inhalation but was not hospitalized, Hoch said.

Several volunteer firemen were still at the scene Tuesday afternoon.

"We thought we had it out," fireman Bill Elliott said. "The owner was going to watch it through the night. We put our equipment away, and when we were called to come back, it was too late to save the other buildings."

The fire started in a building housing a beauty shop, an upholstery shop and three apartments. A combination antique shop and storage building and building housing Alta Vista Lodge No. 357 AF&AM also were destroyed.

Doris Zimmerman, beauty shop owner, said some equipment from her shop was salvaged between the two blazes.

"We saved my blow dryers, permanents and scissors," Zimmerman said. "Most of the stuff, like my curtains, was melted when it came out, so I don't know if what we saved can be used."

Zimmerman, who opened her shop last April, estimated her loss to be about $2,000.

"I don't know if I'll reopen the shop," she said. "I've thought about going to Manhattan and getting a job. But I feel sorry for Tom (Tom Jones, owner of the building which housed the beauty and antique shops). He lost the most."

R.S. "Bat" Nelson, a member of the lodge, said the lodge members were suppose to meet Monday night.

"We were suppose to have our annual election and oyster stew," he said. "I don't know where we'll meet in the future, but we'll probably have the oyster stew, because we have to elect new officers."

Nelson said the lodge was built in 1905.

Records were recovered from the lodge before it burned, one fireman said.

"We got some records out," he said. "But we lost pictures of past masters from 1897 to present. They were big pictures. We lost quite a treasure."

Hoch said his volunteer fire department was aided by members of the community and fire departments from neighboring towns.

"We have 26 men registered with our department, but there were more than that last night," he said. "The Dwight fire department came to both fires. Council Grove and Alma came to the second one."

Roger Lathrop, a city maintenance employee, said he was not sure how much water was used Monday night.

"We had five pumps going all night," he said. "We were pumping 54 gallons per minute for about 12 hours."

Violence accelerates in Middle East

By The Associated Press

Militia gunners poured heavy machine-gun fire at the U.S. Marine base at Beirut airport Tuesday, and a PLO bomb tore apart a bus in Jerusalem, killing four people and wounding 46.

No U.S. casualties were reported in the machine-gun attack, the first on the American contingent of the multinational peacekeeping force since Sunday when an artillery barrage killed eight Marines and wounded two.

At the same time, Beirut radios reported U.S. jets flew reconnaissance over Syrian-controlled Lebanon and Syria said it downed two unmanned Israeli spy planes.

In Tripoli, PLO loyalists were reported ready to evacuate the Lebanese port city in several days.

The Marines at the airport responded to the machine-gun bursts with fire from tank guns and anti-tank weapons. The fire came from an area controlled by Druse and Shiite militias.

"At 5 p.m. (11 a.m. EST) today our eastern perimeter received heavy, concentrated machine-gun fire from a fortified position," said Marine spokesman Maj. Dennis Brooks.

The bus blown apart in Jerusalem was stopped at a traffic light in the Jewish section near a military cemetery.

It was the bloodiest attack on civilians in Israel since Israeli forces invaded Lebanon 18 months ago in an attempt to smash the Palestine Liberation Organization.

It also was the worst terrorist attack in Jerusalem in more than five years.

The PLO in Tripoli claimed responsibility, saying, "This operation comes to escalate the actions of the Palestinian revolution against the Israeli occupiers."

A senior aide to Yasser Arafat said the PLO chief will soon abandon Tripoli and go to Tunis. Arafat and his men have been trapped in northern Lebanon since Nov. 3 by Syrian-backed mutineers who charge he has softened his position toward Israel.

Greek ships were expected in Tripoli "within a few days" to evacuate Arafat and 4,000 of his fighters to Tunisia and North Yemen, Khalil Wazir, Arafat's top military aide said.

Beirut radio stations reported U.S. jets flew new reconnaissance sorties over Syrian positions in Lebanon's central mountains, drawing no ground fire despite Syria's threat to shoot them down.

Syria, however, said its air defenses shot down two unmanned Israeli spy drones — one over east Lebanon's Bekaa Valley and another in Syrian territory shortly before noon. The Israeli command conceded only one drone lost.

Five formations of F-14 Tomcat interceptors, each made up of two jets, streaked over Beirut at mid-afternoon and headed in the direction of the upper Metn mountains where Syrian gunners on Sunday shot down two American fighter-bombers, witnesses said.

Mondale, Cranston battle to win NOW endorsement

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Former Vice President Walter Mondale is favored to win the formal support of the National Organization for Women this weekend, but California Sen. Alan Cranston is putting up a surprisingly effective fight for the presidential endorsement, NOW officials say.

Ohio Sen. John Glenn's chances for NOW's backing in the Democratic presidential race evaporated with his refusal to back federal homosexual rights legislation, NOW board members said in interviews during the past week.

Colorado Sen. Gary Hart and civil rights leader Jesse Jackson have attracted interest, but the NOW board members expressed little willingness to throw the first NOW presidential endorsement to their candidacies. The decision is set for Saturday at a closed meeting of the group's 36-member board.

With a blizzard of mailings, dozens of telephone calls and many personal meetings, the Democratic presidential candidates have sought to win the endorsement of the 250,000-member organization; and in the bargain, the votes of millions of women in the 1984 elections.

Controversial bar to receive license

By WAYNE PRICE
Collegian Reporter

Brad Harrelson, junior in business, said he feels relief.

As an employee of Charlie's Neighborhood Bar, he knows a job that was once in question is no longer uncertain. The City Commission voted 3-2 Tuesday night in favor of the bar receiving a license for sale and consumption of 3.2 cereal malt beverages.

The Commission also voted to grant a similar license to Sam Gilman for Fast Eddys, 1315 Laramie St.

While Harrelson was happy about the decision, a majority of the citizens who filled the City Commission room witnessed the end of an emotional struggle to stop the tavern's existence.

The struggle began when Charlie Busch, owner of the bar, applied for the license. The bar is located in the First Center, Claffin Road and Denison Avenue. It is within 200 feet of the Institute of Religion, which is owned and operated by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. A city ordinance bans consumption of cereal malt beverages within 200 feet of a city or parochial school.

Mayor Wanda Fateley, who voted against the licensing, said her objections were not based on the many moral issues that had surfaced in the wave of controversy surrounding the bar's opening. Nor were they a question of 18 year olds having the right to buy and consume 3.2 beer, of the bar providing an alternative to Aggieville or of abstinence vs. drinking. It was a matter of the public's lack of prior knowledge of the bar, she said.

Fateley and Commissioner Suzanne Lindamood both said they also interpreted the Institute of Religion as a parochial school and that was another reason for their votes.

"In order for a tavern to be put in, there would have to be a public notice in the paper saying specifically that we are going to put a tavern in at this location," Fateley said. "And there would have to be notice given then to property owners within 200 feet of this location with the same information."

"The zoning procedure that was followed for the Planned Unit Development (PUD) did not list that specific use in the public notice or in the notice that went to property owners, and therefore they did not have knowledge to respond to at the time of the zoning," Fateley said.

City Attorney William Frost said that when the zoning changed from a commercial classification to a PUD, notice of specific use is not required.

Gene Klingler voted for the licensing because he said it would not be fair to change the rules "in the middle of the game," and he said if a procedure was neglected in the rezoning hearings it should not be taken out on Busch.

Dan Myers, an attorney representing the Institute of Religion and the Gamma Phi Beta house corporation of alumnae, said the average person would have had extreme difficulty in finding out a tavern was to exist in the center.

"We submit that as a matter of fairness, people were not aware of this," Myers said. "People should not have to listen to KMAN to protect their legal rights."

Myers was responding to a statement made by Commissioner Rick Mann and Richard Seaton, an attorney representing H&L Investments, developers of the center. Mann said there was no public feedback after KMAN broadcasted the possibility of a bar in the center for three days, three times a day.

If there was a structural procedure in the public hearing process concerning the tavern, Frost said the courts would rule in favor of the property owner.

The Commission was to hear the first reading of an ordinance amending the cereal malt beverage licensing provisions relating to public and private schools, but wording problems forced the amendment to be tabled.

Official urges farm leaders to make early ag proposals

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Agricultural leaders ought to start putting forth proposals for the 1985 farm bill so consumer backlash would be limited if prices rise because of the new legislation, former Agriculture Secretary Earl Butz said Tuesday.

Farm industry leaders should mount their farm policy offensive now by explaining how all Americans benefit from agriculture, Butz said. Otherwise, farming is sure to be put on the defensive by consumers if supermarket prices go up, he said.

Butz, who held the farm cabinet post during the Nixon and Ford administrations, made the remarks to agribusinessmen attending the National Fertilizer Solutions Association convention. Butz is dean emeritus of agriculture at Purdue University in Lafayette, Ind.

Butz warned that critics are sure to focus on the increasing costs of farm programs and burgeoning surpluses of commodities as proposals are offered for the new farm bill. Those costs — and the embarrassment they cause farmers and policy-makers — will continue to grow as long as farm policies with high price supports encourage production for government storehouses rather than free markets, he said.

Jackson sends telegram asking for pilot's release

By The Associated Press

The Rev. Jesse Jackson, joining other Democratic presidential candidates on a fund-raising tour, appealed Tuesday to the president of Syria for the release of a U.S. Navy pilot shot down in a bombing raid in Lebanon.

At an appearance in Atlanta, Jackson said he was sending a telegram to Syrian President Hafez Assad asking for the release of Navy Lt. Robert O. Goodman.

Jackson said release of the pilot "would be a gesture that could give us...time that's needed. We need every gesture of friendship and peace that we can (get)."

Six Democratic presidential candidates quelled their rivalries for a day in order to raise $1.5 million for the party to use in the 1984 campaign. The Democrats hope to have $7 million in their presidential fund by the start of the general election campaign next fall.

Sens. Gary Hart of Colorado and John Glenn of Ohio appeared with Jackson at a $500-a-plate breakfast in Atlanta. The trio then flew to Houston for a fund-raising luncheon.

Former Vice President Walter F. Mondale, Sen. Ernest F. Hollings of South Carolina and former

Sen. George McGovern of South Dakota were the attractions at a $500-a-plate breakfast in Chicago.

The final event on the tour was a $1,000-a-plate dinner in Albuquerque where all six candidates were to appear.

While the candidates agreed to campaign cease-fire among themselves, each continued his attack on the Reagan administration — especially its use of troops in the Mideast.

Hart said he wanted Congress to return to session to "require President Reagan to state clearly what our Middle East policy is and what mission our military presence is designed to achieve."

Glenn said he opposed pulling U.S. forces out of Lebanon now, but then added that "I don't think we can continue the way we are."

Jackson said that "America's role should be to lead Syria and Israel to Geneva. This matter must be negotiated out, it must not be fought out."

McGovern said that "if we stay with the Reagan administration we will be at war...We could be at war before the 1984 election."

Mondale attacked the Republican administration record on civil rights, while Hollings said that if the Democrats unite "no force on earth can stop us."

Shuttle test contradicts Nobel theory

By The Associated Press

SPACE CENTER, Houston — NASA gave the Spacelab astronauts an extra day in orbit Tuesday for a voyage that experts say already is rewriting science textbooks by disproving a 77-year-old Nobel Prize-winning theory on the inner ear.

Mission Control announced that space shuttle Columbia will land at 7:58 a.m. Pacific time on Thursday, giving the six-man crew a full 10 days in orbit. Initially the mission had been due to end today.

Mission commander John Young and his crewmates asked for some time off if the mission was extended. Flight planners arranged for the astronauts to have a break from their non-stop science and let them look out the window and take pictures of the Earth.

The astronauts also plan to use the extra day for solar and materials processing experiments, and to repeat an investigation that a German scientist says already has disproved a 77-year-old theory.

Rudolf von Baumgarten of the Johannes Gutenberg Universität in Germany said his study of the effects of weightlessness on the inner ear contradicted research conducted in 1906 by Dr. Robert Barany of Austria.

Barany postulated that convection — the movement of heat through a substance — would carry heat into the inner ear and affect the human balance mechanism there.

For his study, Barany received a Nobel Prize in 1914 and his theory is also applied in an exam commonly given to see if a patient's balance mechanism is working properly. In the test, a doctor introduces a fluid warmer than body temperature into the ear. Then he watches to see if the patient develops a rapid eye movement called nystagmus — which is known to be related to changes in the inner ear.

Since there is no heat convection in the weightlessness of space, von Baumgarten designed an experiment to test Barany's finding using Spacelab scientists Owen Garriott, Byron Lichtenberg, Ulf Merbold and Bob Parker as subjects.

Each endured having warm air pumped against his eardrums while a camera photographed the reaction of his eyes.

If heat convection were the determining factor, the astronauts should not have displayed signs that their inner ears were affected.

But von Baumgarten said, "We got a very strong nystagmus in space" from each of the astronauts.

Von Baumgarten said Merbold experienced 10 times more nystagmus in space than he had on the ground, and Parker, who had almost no eye movement in ground tests, showed a pronounced nystagmus in space.

"We are absolutely convinced," said von Baumgarten. But he noted, "it will never be accepted by science unless it is repeated."

The test is to be run again on the current flight and is planned for another Spacelab mission in 1985.

The astronauts aboard the $1 billion European-built Spacelab were winding down their experiments, having accomplished almost every test planned for the 23-foot-long science workshop. Officials said they will have to spend about 16 hours on today packing and stowing science hardware. Then they will seal hatches leading to Spacelab and close the long cargo bay doors that will protect the science module during landing.

Babbs files suit against governor

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — A controversial Kansas broadcaster has filed a multimillion dollar federal lawsuit against Gov. John Carlin, Attorney General Robert Stephan and others.

The suit filed by Nellie Babbs, co-owner of KTTL-FM in Dodge City, asks for the immediate recovery of her "rights, liberty and property" and alleges she was denied "due process of law."

The suit seeks at least $100 million in damages on each count, but it doesn't enumerate the counts. Babbs said in a telephone interview Tuesday that the $100 million figure was a typographical error and that the total amount of damages sought is about $40 million.

The KTTL operating license of Babbs and her estranged husband, Charles Babbs, has been challenged before the Federal Communications Commission because of programming against blacks and Jews and in favor of the right-wing, anti-tax group, the Posse Comitatus.

Babbs has said the broadcasts were protected by First Amendment guarantees of freedom of speech and freedom of the press.

Last month, Charles Babbs was given temporary control of KTTL after he filed suit to dissolve the partnership with his estranged wife. He said he had left his wife of 17 years in September because of disagreements over KTTL programming.

Mrs. Babbs said Carlin was named in her suit because he isn't protecting her from harassment and hasn't stepped in to replace the federal government's money system with a valid method of exchange. Babbs believes the money system is illegal and that paper money is worthless because it no longer is backed by gold or silver reserves.

Carlin had no comment on the suit, press secretary Mike Swenson said Tuesday.

"The governor has not been involved in the issues surrounding her and her radio station," Swenson said.

Mrs. Babbs said Stephan was named in the suit because he is trying to force her to identify customers of her mobile phone service so he can harass them. Stephan has filed a lawsuit on behalf of the state Department of Revenue attempting to force Mrs. Babbs to file a rendition statement listing the service's property for tax purposes.

Mrs. Babbs' suit, which was filed Friday in U.S. District Court in Wichita, also names as defendants Dodge City lawyers John Fierro and Donald E. Schultz, and Pauline Schwarm, a Kiowa County District Court magistrate.

Dedicated to studios

Those who sit in classrooms all of the time will have knowledge, but they won't necessarily know how to use it. The way to prepare students for the "real world" is to give them real-life applications to what they learn.

This philosophy was put to play when a group of graduate students in landscape architecture did a three-week study into Manhattan's highway entrances. The results were presented Monday in the presence of one city commissioner and the Chamber of Commerce's director of operations.

Besides giving the students an opportunity to take what they have learned and apply it toward a practical application, it also benefitted the city of Manhattan. The city received practical, professional suggestions as to what it can do to beautify its highway entrances.

These projects are familiar in the College of Architecture and Design. It is not the first time the college has taken such a project and finished it for the benefit of the city or some other group. Apparently the students reason that as long as they are going to stay up all week working on a project, it might as well benefit someone besides themselves.

This is not to slight the other colleges and students who spend long hours working on projects which will benefit some outside organizations. There are many such cases of student projects which help an organization or group work more efficiently and achieve its goal in a better way. It is only fair that the knowledge accumulated at a university go to help others who are not necessarily associated with the university.

But this is to honor a group of people that one has to respect, if only for displaying a fanatical devotion to finishing projects. In no other college but architecture would you find anyone who felt guilty about not having pulled at least one "all-nighter" a week, or where there are a majority of people who had learned to effectively operate on an average of three hours of sleep a night.

It is difficult to find many students who are as dedicated to their homework and to their future as an architecture student. Few students are willing to put in the late night hours and are able to work so meticulously for long stretches of time with little sleep. Here's to those who are.

Evaluation of students

Evaluate: to determine the value or worth of.

During the last 17 weeks your instructors have, in essence, been evaluating you. They have had you take tests, write papers, read books, do reports, sketches, drawings and a number of other things so they may determine your grade at the end of the semester. Your grade is a measure of your worth as a student.

Most of you have probably been so busy doing or avoiding these assignments that you haven't given much thought about the worth of your instructors.

Now is your chance. I'm not talking about whether you like him or her personally, what they look like or how they dress, but what kind of opportunity you have been given to learn in your class.

That is the purpose for teacher evaluations — or so they tell us. These evaluations are our chance to speak against or in favor of the system to which we have been subjected to for the last semester.

Maybe the problem with these evaluations is that we really don't know what good they'll do, so we don't put much thought into filling them out. Sometimes I feel as though they're given and then tossed in the wastebasket. Maybe that's where they belong.

Evaluations are usually given the last day of class. Now anyone who has been here very long knows the last day of class is usually the worst. You're glassy-eyed from staying up all night to turn in your last report for this person they call a teacher and now, when you'd really rather be asleep, they expect you to evaluate the guy. Hurry up, get it done and go home to sleep.

Let's take a look at the choices we are given when evaluating these people. DW-definite weakness, W-more a weakness than a strength, I-in between, S-more a strength than a weakness and DS-definite strength. Good grief, looks like another multiple-guess test to me.

The questions themselves belong in a category all their own; file them in number 13 please.

Question one: "The instructor presented the material in an interesting way." Please, today even beer couldn't be presented in an interesting way.

"The instructor demonstrated enthusiasm for the course and for teaching." Well, he didn't turn cartwheels in class because of the subject matter, but at least he didn't fall asleep while lecturing, although I did once or twice. I guess the answer must be I.

DARCY WARD
Collegian Columnist

"The instructor has command of the subject" (we're in the army now), "discusses current developments and relates course material to other areas of knowledge." Oh, that must mean he knows what he's talking about and can take it out of the textbook and put it into the real world. Why didn't they just say so, or maybe it's a trick question.

"The instructor communicates clearly, and class presentations were well organized." Does that mean he doesn't stutter and can stay on one subject for longer than one minute without straying to another? This guy can ramble on about nothing for days. I'll give him a DS.

"The instructor is sensitive to the response of the class, knows if they are understanding and is well informed about their progress." In other words, if there is an overwhelming look of confusion on the majority of the faces in class, does the instructor go back and cover it again, or does he go on to the next subject and confuse the class even more. I've had a confused look on my face since enrollment and he hasn't repeated anything for me. No question — W.

"The instructor is reasonably available for help outside the class and shows a helpful attitude." I.e., does he just post office hours or is he really there to help.

Well, now that they have your opinions about the instructor, they really get tough by having you rate yourself.

"I was pleased with how much I learned in the course." Let's be real here, how am I suppose to know how much I learned before I get my grade?

"I did my part to make this a successful course." Well, let's see. I went to class 50 percent of the time, turned in 50 percent of the required work and read 50 percent of the text book. I'd say I did my share.

"In terms of overall effectiveness as a teacher, this instructor was: among the worst I have had, somewhat below average, or about average." On any given day, all of the above. This question is the real clincher. But maybe it should be asked about the student and not the teacher.

I'm not saying that there aren't any bad instructors on campus. I even have my own personal list entitled "instructors to be canned." But I'm convinced that there are more adequate instructors than inadequate ones.

Maybe the problem isn't with the instructors, but with the students. We gripe about the high cost of education and then we waste our money by attending only half the classes and doing only enough work to get by. It just doesn't make sense.

Probably the most important thing I've learned at K-State is that the more effort you put into something, the more you get in return. Especially in school.

I think students have the wrong idea when they enroll in college. They think they're buying a degree. But what they're really buying is the opportunity to earn a degree. Knowledge itself can't be bought, you have to earn it.

So you have the choice of wasting your time and money by attending only half the classes and doing only half the work, and so getting only half your money's worth. Or you can go to class and do the work and put effort into what you turn in and get your money's worth.

We can gripe about poor teachers and fill out evaluations. But you can get something out of even the poorest of instructors if you make yourself learn, if you put forth the effort.

You wouldn't throw away your vacation money by spending all your time stuck in a hotel room. So why throw away your college years by spending your time outside the classroom? After all, opportunity only knocks once.

Maybe while we're evaluating the instructors on campus we should also have the instructors evaluate us. Not with grades, but with evaluation forms. As students in general we might not be worth as much as we think.

Preoccupation with death

(Author's Note: The following item was written in February, 1947, when I was 24 years old, three months after I was discharged from the Army, and appeared originally in the March 21, 1948 issue of Manuscript, a literary magazine published in California from 1948 through 1951.)

Old Man Lane says, "Hello, brother, when did they let you out?" to the tall, gaunt-faced man, named Cal, who is walking slowly past us.

This is Old Man Lane's greeting to all men who pass him by on this corner.

Every man is his brother.

Late morning sunlight glints in Old Man Lane's clear-white hair, which is carefully combed straight back on his head. He uses two canes to support his body against the pain of constant arthritis. The air in Southern California is not cold, even though it is February. In the sun, warmth comes quickly.

"They didn't let me out! I escaped," the gaunt-faced man answers petulantly, sickness in his eyes.

He is clothed in a heavy wool shirt, under which can be seen the bulge of equally heavy underwear.

Lane shifts his weight, leaning heavily on the canes, says, "Escaped, eh? Maybe I should report you to the authorities."

"You don't have to. I'm going back to my room now so I won't die here in the street."

"Why not die here in the street? Just as good as anywhere else. Probably cheaper. Nice and warm here. I'll call the nearest funeral home and have them come pick you up."

"No, not me you won't. I'll go back to my room so I can die where I belong."

"Okay, brother. But on your way back to where you belong, you should stop by the funeral home to see the body of Roger Zimmerman."

"Who?" asks the gaunt-faced man, uneasiness and the fear of death in his face.

"Roger Zimmerman. You know — the fellow who delivered the mail for so many years in this town. A finer fellow never walked these streets."

"You don't mean the one who used to deliver the mail out my way?"

"Yes, that's the one, all right. He just died here real recent. And he hadn't been sick more than two, three days."

"Roger Zimmerman dead! Well, I declare," says the gaunt-faced man,

JOEL CLIMENHAGA
Collegian Columnist

named Cal, in his voice a great and powerful sadness. "When did he die?"

"I don't remember for sure. Right recent it was." Lane turns toward me, where I am leaning against the building, listening. "Do you know when he died? Night before last, wasn't it?"

"Three nights ago," I reply, "half an hour after midnight. You know he lived in the house next to where I live."

"I remember now," says Lane. "I read in the paper where they're going to bury him tomorrow."

"Well, well, so Roger Zimmerman is dead," the gaunt-faced man mutters, his eyes preoccupied with his vision of death. "Well, it comes to us all."

"Yes," agrees Lane, "to us all. Why, there isn't one of us here," including the three of us standing on the corner with a slow wave of his right arm, the one cane falling loosely to the pavement, "who won't more than likely be dead a hundred years from now." There is more tired resignation in his voice than satire. He bends over slowly and carefully to pick up the loose cane.

"I'm not very old yet," I say confidently. "I'll not die for awhile."

"But in a hundred years," warns Old Man Lane.

"We all die," ruminates the gaunt-faced man. "Why, just the other day, I saw a woman come up to McWilliams, the barber, and ask him how his wife was. McWilliams looked at her and said, 'Lady, I laid my wife away just last week in her grave. I guess she's all right now.' That's what McWilliams said. And she'd been sick only three days. We all die."

Another man, gnarled and squat in stature, named Lester, comes ambling slowly up the street.

"Good morning, Lester," says Old Man Lane.

"Morning, colonel," says Lester. He turns toward the gaunt-faced man, saying, "Hello, Cal. I hear you've been sick."

"Yes, I've been sick since before Christmas," Cal says. "And here it's the last of February already. I'm not the least bit well, yet. In fact, I'm going back to my room now so I won't die here like a dog in the street."

Lester nods his head sympathetically, ends this brief exchange by saying, "Well, take it easy, Cal. I'll see you around."

"Maybe. Maybe not," Cal replies. "Good-bye, Lester," says Old Man Lane.

"Good-bye, colonel."

Lester ambles on up the street.

"Then some of us die young, too," reflects Lane. "Take this 20-year-old girl down in the city that was murdered a couple of weeks back. She died young!"

"For that matter," I add, "it sometimes seems to me as if the whole world is trying to see just how quickly it can kill itself off."

"Yes," observes Lane, "those boys are still dying overseas all the time. And those big bombs they dropped on Japan a year or so back killed one hell of a lot of people." He shifts his weight uneasily on his canes. "Another fifty years or so, who can tell what will happen?" His voice gloomily trails away into silence.

"There is too much murder and death in this world," whines the gaunt-faced man. "It isn't right that any of us should have to die. But we all do. And I'm going back to my room now so I won't have to die here in the street like a dog." Cal is becoming half-mad, as he stands there, fighting his own private battle with the terror and fear of death his sickness causes him.

A young girl, named Maureen, with whom I believe myself to be in love, comes walking across the street intersection, smiles in greeting to me.

Her smile brings me back to this life now, the feel of the sun on my back, the sight of snow on the mountains, and a woman's comradeship. I walk down the street with her.

'Society' not to blame for deaths

Editor,

Bravo to Charles Kincaid for his remembrance of the more painful events in rock history. Certainly those artists who've died, and those who were victims of being in the wrong place at the wrong time, serve as reminders to us all of what can happen when excess rather than clear thinking takes over.

We do, however, take issue with Kincaid's misguided disillusionment. He seems to be placing the blame for these tragedies on "society," rather than viewing them as misguided individuals.

We are members of the KSDB-FM staff, and as such, we must state publicly that Kincaid is seriously mistaken in assuming that people at The Point neither remember nor care about what's happened. We can't speak for the whole staff, but it is safe to assume that a vast majority of staff members care deeply about those tragedies. As an example of individual staffers' remembrance, last Sunday's Tour presented a memorial to John Lennon.

Let's be a bit more objective about Lennon's death. True, it was a black day for music, but to blame society for his murder is a bit like blaming Chevrolet for drunk drivers. Lennon was murdered by an unstable individual. Joplin, Hendrix, Morrison, Sid Vicious, Presley and Moon weren't society's victims; they were victims of their own inability to handle excess and pressure. Ask Pink Floyd mentor Syd Barrett (if ever he has a lucid moment) if it was society that drove him to an asylum, and he would probably say no; it was his 532nd hit of LSD. Bon Scott of AC/DC didn't die because society victimized him; he died because a couple fifths of vodka at one sitting was a nice way of zoning out. Right, Charles, we're to blame. Take off your blinders.

Moreover, to assume that a general apathy exists among the radio station, the Collegian or society is to sell most of us short. The Point and the Collegian are made up of individuals. A collective opinion would be expressed as an editorial. We can't speak for the Collegian (though we're sure its staff feels like we do), and The Point has been prohibited by the FCC from editorializing under rules regarding non-commercial educational stations. But staff members occasionally speak out, as evidenced by The Tour and other specialty programs.

Mr. Kincaid, do not saddle us with the unreasonable burden of taking the blame for an individual's mistakes. We do the best we can as individuals, and yes, we remember and mourn.

Care assists premature babies' fight for life

By DARCYP MCPHERSON WARD
Collegian Columnist

Shannon Conner lay quietly in her baby seat during a night class at K-State which her mother attends. She watched the lights, her hands and occasionally made a small noise to let her mom know that she was hungry. She looked like a happy, healthy 10-month-old baby.

But looks can be deceiving. While happy and healthy are good words to describe Shannon, she is actually not the 10-month-old she appears to be, but is 14 months old.

In 1982, 87 premature babies were born in Manhattan, according to Sharon Saunders, nursery unit manager at Memorial Hospital, who added that Shannon was the smallest surviving baby. At birth, Shannon weighed only 710 grams (1 pound, 5 ounces) and was only 12 inches long.

Saunders, who was present at Shannon's birth, recalled thinking about how small Shannon was.

"When I weighed her, I remember thinking about, of all things, a sack of brown sugar, and how this tiny baby girl weighed even less than that. She was so little she lay between the tip of my forefinger and about one-third of the way up my forearm."

Shannon is the daughter of Leon and Kelly Conner. Her father is a teacher at Fort Riley Junior High, and her mother is a K-State graduate student in speech pathology.

Because Memorial is not equipped to handle very small premature babies, most are transferred to other hospitals by plane. When the weather is bad, a special transport team is used.

"The transport team is made up of a nurse and respiratory therapist. Both are specially trained to work with premature infants," Saunders said.

Just hours after she was born, Shannon was moved to Wesley Medical Center in Wichita. She stayed there for 11 weeks, then returned to Memorial Hospital for three more weeks.

During that time, her parents traveled back and forth to Wichita from Manhattan to keep in contact with their tiny daughter.

A few months after the birth of her premature baby, Kelly joined a local support group composed of parents who were going through the same experience she was, Parents Encouraging Parents.

"The purpose of the group is to help out new parents of premature babies; they need people to talk with. There are just some things you'd rather not ask a nurse. It's just easier to ask another parent," Kelly said.

Saunders, who also works with the group, says that she can see the need for such a group.

"Once I was aware of the need of the group and when parents showed enough interest, we got the group together. Now we let all parents of premature babies born at Memorial know about the group," Saunders said.

She said not every parent feels as though they need the group. Some feel that their families will be all the support they need.

"But we're still around for these people. Sometimes they find out that their extended families don't really know very much about the problems of premature babies. Parents can join or just talk to parents in the group anytime," she said.

Saunders coordinates the speakers for the meetings, most of whom are doctors in the community who talk about specific problems premature babies have.

And they can have a lot of problems.

Because their bodies are expected to be functioning on their own when they should still be receiving help from their mother's body, premature babies have problems full-term babies don't have.

Premies (another word for premature babies) can have breathing trouble, brain damage and heart conditions. They also have a higher instance of SIDS (sudden infant death syndrome).

Saunders said the smaller the baby, the more problems it seems to have.

He said the reason for the higher instance of SIDS is not really known. Some professionals believe it's because premies already have irregular breathing and heartbeats, which seem to be contributing factors in SIDS.

Because of the higher instance of SIDS, most premature babies go home with SIDS monitors.

The types of monitors the babies use vary, Saunders said. One type looks like a heating pad and the baby is placed on top of it. Another type wraps around the baby like a belt, and still another type has electrode patches that look similar to those used in hospitals to monitor heart patients.

Astronomical medical bills also are another problem the parents of premature babies face.

The Conners' medical bills for Shannon were over $110,000. Student Occidental Insurance covered $65,000, and a grant from the Hill Burton Charity Fund picked up the remainder of the Wesley bill, about $28,000.

The rest is being paid a little at a time by the Conners.

According to Sandy Bulmahn, director of social services at Memorial Hospital, there are organizations to help parents meet the high hospital costs.

"The problem is that not every baby will fit in a program. It depends on the diagnosis," Bulmahn said.

Bulmahn said the Kansas Crippled Childrens Program can help some children. Others can be helped by such organizations as SSI (Supplemental Security Income), SRS (Social Rehabilitation Services), Medicaid, Lutheran Social Services and Big Lakes Developmental Center.

But Kelly Conner said she was not told that many of these services were available until it was too late to apply.

"Social workers didn't approach me with things like Kansas Crippled Childrens (Fund) until after it was too late. You have to apply before the fact (medical treatment) for some of the medical bills," Conner said.

"That's one thing we in the group try to do. We make sure that the parents know what kind of help is available. It's no fault of the social worker; sometimes even they don't know," she said.

Premature babies also are more likely to be abused children, Saunders said.

"Most of the time parents are unprepared for a premature baby and all the problems they bring. We're such a normal baby society. We anticipate having a nice, healthy, bouncing baby, and when it doesn't happen, we just don't know how to cope," Saunders said.

Saunders said the reason premature babies are more often abused is because there is little or no bonding between parent and child at birth.

"Some parents just can't take the distance. They don't have the opportunity to hold, touch, cuddle or even feed their baby. These are the things that create the bond between mother and child," she said.

Other problems, Saunders said, can begin when parents blame themselves or each other, when there is financial stress, when there are other siblings or a when a drastic change in lifestyle occurs.

"Many mothers can't go back to work the way they had planned, and they feel trapped. They just can't adjust to the changes in their lives," Saunders said.

Support groups such as Parents Encouraging Parents are really needed now, but Saunders said she sees the time when these types of support groups won't be needed as intensely.

"We don't know what the long-term effects are going to be. So it helps for a new mother of a premie to see what a 3- or 4-year-old premie is doing now. As soon as we have statistics and data on what the long-term effects on these kids will be, the need for these support groups will probably decline," she said.

Shannon's prospects appear hopeful. She now weighs 12 pounds, 15 ounces and is 24½ inches long. She is normally developed for her adjusted age (her actual age less the 15 weeks she was premature) except for her speech, which is developing more slowly.

But the Conners still have some problems.

"I know, for instance when we go out to eat, Shannon can't be exposed to smoke, so we have to almost fight for a non-smoking section. She also can't be around other children, because she's so susceptible to pneumonia and other respiratory ailments because her lungs aren't developed properly," Kelly said.

While Shannon's problems seem fewer now than ever before, another little girl lies inside the islet at Memorial. She weighs less than four pounds and is surrounded by tubes and machines that measure her heart beats, respirations and even feed her. But hope also hangs in her protective temporary home in the form of Christmas pictures drawn by her brother and sister, and a smiling clown crib mobile. She looks so peaceful now, but her fight for life hasn't been an easy one. Maybe her biggest problems are just beginning. Nobody seems to know for sure.

Actress makes plea for needy kids

NEW YORK — Liv Ullmann stepped out of her role of actress to speak as a mother, asking for international help for homeless and hungry children around the world.

"If a society does not save them and improve their opportunities for survival and development, that society is condemning itself to the vicious circle of poverty, dependency and underdevelopment," she said Monday.

The Norwegian actress, best known for her roles in Ingmar Bergman films, including "Cries and Whispers" and "Scenes from a Marriage," was the keynote speaker at the opening of a three-day symposium on "street youth."

She said 40,000 children around the world die every day, many "because poor women cannot bring their children to a hospital for help."

"Abandoned children have been a part of our shame for a long time," said the 43-year-old actress. "I would like to call them emigrants. They are not all abandoned: they come from abandoned families — families abandoned by society."

Ullmann called for widespread dissemination of information about "oral rehydration salts," which she said at 5 cents per treatment could save 20,000 children daily from dying of diarrhea induced by starvation.

Kennedy's propose new fund-raiser

BOSTON — Members of the Kennedy clan are kicking off a campaign to raise $8 million over the next three years to endow the John F. Kennedy Library.

"It is important that this facility will be a live facility and continue to touch the people of Boston," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., told a news conference Monday night.

He said the facility on the Dorchester waterfront, which was built with private funds, is the only presidential library without an endowment.

"One of the things President Kennedy would have been most pleased with are the 150,000 students who have come here to do research," he added. "We want to enhance that."

Kennedy was joined at the gathering by Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, Caroline Kennedy, Patricia Kennedy Lawford and her daughter, Sydney Lawford McKelvy, and Stephen E. Smith, Kennedy's brother-in-law and president of the library corporation.

Smith said the corporation will be renamed the JFK Library Foundation, and the board will be restructured next month. He said $1.5 million has already been pledged by the Kennedy family and the Permanent Charity Fund of Boston.

After years of trying to find a home, the Kennedy Library was built with private funds. It is run by the U.S. National Archives and Records Service, which operates all presidential libraries.

Ex-bridge pro spurs team to victory

BAL HARBOUR, Fla. — Oswald Jacoby, a major figure in the game of bridge for 60 years, made a cameo appearance as a guest captain to help his team win the 1983 North American Bridge championship.

The 80-year-old Jacoby, who is terminally ill with cancer, was asked to join a group headed by Edgar Kaplan of New York that was eighth going into Sunday night's final round.

Jacoby and teammates charged to the top to win the Reisinger Trophy. They defeated the team of his son, Jim, in the process.

Jacoby, named the American Contract Bridge League's man of the year, helped propel the game into world prominence in the 1930s. His teammates, who also won the 1982 trophy, were Bill Root of Boca Raton, Fla., Richard Pavlicek of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and Norman Kay of Narberth, Pa.

Baby boom generation settles down with age

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The baby boom generation, which jammed kindergartens in the 1950s, sparked campus turmoil and the sexual revolution in the 1960s and crowded the job market in the 1970s, is showing signs of settling down.

That is the conclusion of the life and health insurance industries, which released a study Tuesday based on a telephone survey last January of 1,000 members of that outsized generation of Americans born between 1946 and 1964.

The 74.3 million baby boomers — one of every three Americans — still show a streak of independence but also exhibit some highly traditional views, the study shows.

They strongly favor marriage over being single, frown on marijuana use and would like to see more respect for authority.

But 76 percent of these young Americans, aged 19 to 37, prefer an "equal" marriage with both spouses sharing responsibility for work, homemaking and child-rearing.

Most disagreed with the notion that "a woman's place is in the home," and subscribed to the idea that "working women make more interesting partners in marriage."

A majority of them, 56 percent, said they approved of unmarried adults of the opposite sex living together, while 32 percent disapproved. Forty-one percent said they would welcome more sexual freedom, but 52 percent would not. Only 24 percent favored wider acceptance of marijuana usage, while 70 percent were opposed.

Politically, 37 percent considered themselves Democrats, 34 percent independents and 25 percent Republicans.

Fifty-nine percent think the federal government can be trusted to do what is right only some of the time. "One-third say most of the time, and only 5 percent say you can always trust the government," the report said.

An overwhelming 93 percent favor more stress on traditional families ties while 87 percent would like to see more respect for authority.

Despite their feelings about an "equal" marriage, nearly two-thirds of them, 63 percent, said that only economic necessity should lead a mother of preschool children to work outside the home. Fifty-one percent agreed that "strict, old-fashioned upbringing and discipline" were still the best way to rear children, while 36 percent disagreed.

Five of every 10 are married, four are single and one is either divorced, separated or widowed. In the unmarried, 10 percent prefer the single life. Five percent favor living together outside marriage.

Their median income in 1981 was just under $7,900, meaning half of them made more and half of them less. But 30 percent of the oldest — those aged 33 to 36 years — made $20,000 or more in 1981.

The report by the American Council of Life Insurance and the Health Insurance Association of America also cited a Census Bureau population survey which found that 77 percent of the baby boomers were working or looking for a job in 1982.

'The Nutcracker'

During Tuesday night's performance of "The Nutcracker" in McCain Auditorium, the Tulsa Ballet Theatre performs the Children's Dance.

The Tulsa Ballet Theatre gave Manhattan an early holiday gift. The charming classic Christmas ballet, "The Nutcracker," was presented last night in McCain Auditorium.

The company of 28 dancers was accompanied by the K-State Orchestra and 30 local children playing mice, angels, soldiers, rabbits and clowns.

Matthew Bridwell, principal male dancer, said he "grew up" with the company.

"I decided that this is where I wanted to make my home. I love Tulsa passionately. I love dancing for the Jasinskis."

Roman Jasinski and his wife, Moscelyne Larkin are co-founders and co-artistic directors of the company. They are the reason that one-third of the dancers who trained in the Jasinski's school have stayed in Tulsa.

Principal female dancer Melissa Hale was accepted into the American Ballet Theatre in New York directly from high school. She said she returned to the Jasinskis' company because she loves to dance for the Jasinskis and because Tulsa is home.

Hale said many dancers "company hop" from one group to another in an effort to find the "perfect company."

"A lot of people have left and come back," Hale said.

Principal dancer Cynthia Crews has been with the company for six years and said she also feels strongly about the Jasinskis.

"I've trained with Mr. Jasinski since I was a child," she said. "He's known me since I was born."

"Mr. Jasinski really encourages you to have your own personality when you dance. It's very satisfying to me to be able to show my own personality instead of trying to be someone else," she said.

Crews, like many of the dancers, went to New York and returned to Tulsa, knowing that Oklahoma is the place she wanted to dance.

"I enjoy coming to the Midwest because a lot of times we get a chance to perform for people who've never seen a good ballet company," she said.

"They come backstage and talk to us and they've really enjoyed it," Crews said. "What I like is the person who gets dragged to the ballet. They say, 'I wanna see another one!' They never expect it to be fun and enjoyable."

This is Tulsa Ballet Theatre's second visit to Manhattan.

"In fact, everybody looked forward to coming here," Bridwell said.

Due to the expense involved in accompaniment with a live orchestra, the company usually relies on taped music. Jasinski is very particular about everything connected with the ballet, including those irritating crackles in most recorded music.

"I make him (the sound engineer) take out the pops. I don't like pops. It takes hours. He takes out little tiny pieces of tape," Jasinski said.

"Luckily, we're working with a good orchestra," Bridwell said. "The conductor is concerned about what's going on on stage. The conductor has to be watching the dancers. When those two are working together you have a very fine performance."

"You should be proud of your orchestra. It's a fine orchestra," he said.

The company rehearsed with the orchestra Monday evening. The orchestra, under the direction of Ralph Winkler, associate professor of music, began learning the score about six weeks ago. Many of the orchestra members were familiar with the music from the performance last year.

"If you would ask anybody in the world, 'Nutcracker' is the all-time favorite," Bridwell said.

The Tulsa Ballet version of "The Nutcracker" is performed in the Ballet Russe tradition. Before the Jasinskis created the Tulsa Ballet Theatre, both were leading dancers in the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo.

"There are many versions of 'Nutcracker,' but as for their version, it's very very close to what they (Ballet Russe) did. It's like a fine piece of architecture; it will last forever," Bridwell said.

He compared the Tulsa Ballet's choreography of the Chinese dance in the second act to another company's version.

"The Jasinski's (version) has a Chinaman and two females. They do a single dance together," he said. "If done right, it can be very comical. If done wrong, it may not come across at all — it may not work."

"In Cincinnati Ballet, that same piece is done by two males — and it's funny, too. Both are successful in what they're trying to portray."

Bridwell said "The Nutcracker" is not as mentally demanding because he has been dancing the ballet for several years.

"There is very little time to rest between the pieces. You have to keep the mental and physical energy, you can't show the effort. The point is to make it look as effortless as possible," he said. "The audience doesn't want to see how hard it is, it has to look easy or the whole effect is destroyed."

"The best thing I've ever learned from the Jasinskis — it's not what you do, it's how you do it. You can get on stage and do spectacular things and be as dull as a peach. Whereas, if your personality comes out and grabs the audience, the audience will remember you."

Marc Hughes, a soloist, intends to stay with the company as long as he's a classical ballet dancer.

"There's no other company in this nation that I'd care to dance with," he said.

Since the Jasinskis created the company in 1958 from their Tulsa School of Ballet, each year has been a process of growth. The company became professional just eight years ago and already has a national reputation as a major ballet company.

"There is no end to their potential," Hughes said.

"Any stage production that Tulsa Ballet Theatre wanted to do, they could do. That's because of Mr. Jasinski. His concepts are so broad — he's seen a lot."

Besides touring each fall with "The Nutcracker," the company has 40 ballets in the repertory. Performances in Tulsa and on tour make up the 36-week season. During the time off people rest and take classes, Crews said.

"It's very strenuous through the year on your body. A lot of times you'll get a little injury and keep dancing on it. During the summer you let it heal," she said.

Only a few balcony seats remain for today's 7 p.m. performance. The usual curtain time has been changed to accommodate children of all ages, though the tickets read 8 p.m.

Drug raid fails to smoke out criminals

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A little more than three months ago, Attorney General Robert Stephan invited the news media to accompany him on a drug raid in Leavenworth County in which law enforcement agents cut and burned an estimated 58,000 marijuana plants.

On Tuesday, both local authorities and the attorney general's office confirmed that they have closed the book on the raid last August without making any arrests and agreed that none were likely. The officials said their investigation concluded the marijuana had been growing wild.

That news prompted state Rep. Vic Miller, D-Topeka, to criticize the operation and question whether law enforcement agencies, such as the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, should focus so much attention on marijuana eradication programs.

"Instead of using our agents to chop weeds, we should use them to make arrests," said Miller. "I don't think they are horticulturists. They are law enforcement agents."

'Wild' weed wastes work

Miller, a lawyer, first expressed concerns about the raid a few days after it occurred. He sent a letter to KBI Director Thomas Kelly last August asking for clarification on the operation.

"It does bother me a little bit that we swoop down on a field and claim a big success when all we have done is gone out and cut a lot of wild weeds," said Miller. "Highly publicized arrests, prosecution and incarceration are the best deterrents."

Miller said he would bring up the issue of marijuana raids during the 1984 session of the Kansas Legislature, and try to determine what can be done to help the KBI.

Despite the lack of arrests in the Leavenworth County case, a spokesman for the attorney general's office said state law enforcement officials consider the raid a success because it resulted in the destruction of marijuana plants.

"I think there was an overall benefit from the operation," said Neil Woerman, a special assistant to Stephan. "There was just a huge amount of marijuana destroyed. A major objective was destruction and keeping it out of the market."

The raid occurred in late August on a farm one-half mile north of DeSoto in Leavenworth County. The marijuana had been spotted by airplane through a marijuana eradication program conducted by the KBI. Both Stephan and Kelly took part in the raid, and the attorney general estimated that 25 percent of the marijuana was cultivated.

Information gathered by the KBI investigation was turned over to Bob Davis, the Leavenworth County attorney, and he concluded there was nothing to support any arrests.

"There was no evidence that the owners of the property were guilty of any knowing criminal violation," said Frank Kohl, assistant county attorney. "Based on those reports (KBI), it appeared the marijuana was growing wild as opposed to being cultivated."

The drug raid near DeSoto stirred considerable controversy at the time. Douglas County District Attorney Jerry Harper publicly criticized the lack of arrests from it and a series of other marijuana raids, labeling the drug operations "poorly organized and unprofessional." And Miller sent his letter to the KBI chief, saying there was public sentiment that the Leavenworth County raid was a "bungled publicity stunt" because of the lack of arrests.

"I would have to change my characterization from a bungled publicity stunt to a well executed publicity stunt," Miller said Tuesday. "They got the publicity they wanted, but that doesn't make for good law enforcement."

House study assails Federal Reserve secrecy

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A study by the House Banking Committee on Tuesday assailed as "intolerable in a democracy" the secrecy that surrounds the Federal Reserve Board's monetary policy sessions.

The central bank, the report said, "has not been authorized to conduct covert operations in our nation's money markets, but the Central Intelligence Agency would be proud to match the Fed's record for operating in the shadows."

Several panel members took issue with the sharp tone of the report and noted the full committee did not vote to adopt the document, which includes a disclaimer to that effect on its cover.

"Objection must be lodged against the insidious tone of this report. ... I do not believe it reflects majority sentiment on the committee," said Rep. Stephen L. Neal, D-N.C., in a dissenting view.

A committee spokesman, who asked not to be identified, said, however, "It generally reflects the views of a majority of the committee."

The study, put together by the committee's staff, recommends that Federal Reserve policy-makers be more open in their deliberations and announce certain decisions on monetary policy as soon as they are made.

But Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker, responding to questions earlier in the week about the report, said, "You won't get better policy by conducting (monetary policy) in a goldfish bowl."

The board's policy-makers — the Federal Open Market Committee — meet about eight times a year. The minutes of the meetings aren't made public until about six weeks later, after the next meeting. The panel consists of the seven governors of the Federal Reserve Board and the presidents of five of the 12 regional Federal Reserve Banks.

In those sessions, the Open Market Committee decides how to control the supply of money and credit to the banking system, which indirectly affects the level of interest rates. The policy-makers have been maintaining a modest level of restraint on the money supply in an effort to keep inflation under control.

The study said it wants the policy-makers to announce their intermediate targets for the growth in the money supply "when it makes those decisions." It also called for releasing verbatim transcripts of all policy-making meetings within four years after they take place.

It said the secrecy causes "unnecessary volatility" in money markets and leads to "unreasonably high interest rates, as investors analyze every bit of minutiae the board publishes, announces or leaks."

To support its argument, the study cited daily news reports that track developments in the credit markets.

The study also recommended: —That the Federal Reserve abandon its measure of the basic money supply, called M1. "The volatility, uncertainty and meaninglessness of the weekly M1 numbers certainly justify such a decision by the board," it said.

—That the Federal Reserve not "let its commitment to fighting inflation stall a sustained, strong recovery."

St Germain said that "it is cruel to pretend that an acceptable level of inflation is a more serious problem than millions of unemployed Americans."

—That the term of the board's chairman coincide more closely with that of the president's so that chief executives could have their own appointees in the powerful position. Under the committee's suggestion, the Federal Reserve chairman's term would begin in the February of the year following the start of a president's term.

Volcker has supported a similar change.

Paper currency printing proposal aims to deter counterfeit artists

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Picture, if you will, George Washington winking as you move a dollar bill from side to side.

A blue dollar bill, that is.

Woven with metal threads carrying information in secret code.

Our currency for the 1990s?

The mental picture goes well beyond what the government is willing to say about plans to change America's folding money in the next few years. And it's probably wilder than what will actually happen.

But changes are indeed coming for familiar old U.S. currency — the first substantial changes in more than half a century. And the possibilities apparently do include colors, coded threads and "optical variables" that change shape when viewed from different angles.

Though officials are secretive about proposed alterations, they are open about the cause: A fear that sophisticated new photocopying machines could soon make counterfeiting much easier than it has been.

Need groceries on the way home from work? Before leaving, just run off some cash on the office copier. Federal officials, studying the problem for several years, don't think that's far-fetched in light of expected technological advances in copiers.

And former U.S. Treasurer Angela Buchanan, whose signature still appears on new currency, real or counterfeit, said in an interview before she left Washington earlier this year, "When you bring counterfeiters into the office-boy level, you really have problems."

Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker, who is responsible for guarding the credibility of the U.S.

monetary system, said recently the threat seemed to be genuine and "the desire to keep ahead of that technology may point to some technical devices" in American currency.

Treasury spokesmen say no decisions have been made on how to change paper money. And they play down the possibility of drastic changes, noting that the government wouldn't want to do anything to lower the respect U.S. currency commands.

However, a decision is close enough that officials felt the need to show a few congressmen prototype bills in a secret meeting last month. Rep. Ron Paul, a Texas Republican, reacted to the secrecy by calling a news conference.

Paul, a critic of even the current U.S. monetary system, said Treasury wouldn't let him keep any of the mock-ups. So he showed the press some artists' renderings of pink and blue bills.

Government officials said that was preposterous. At most, there would be a few "tinted" threads woven into the bills' backgrounds — detectable only at close range by holding the bills up at an angle.

Paul's aides disputed that reaction, saying the colors were much more noticeable. The general public isn't getting a look now, so the proof will have to be in the eventual printing.

Other changes being considered, according to sources in the government and out:

— Holograms, which produce three-dimensional pictures, or plastic strips that would show different images when viewed from different directions. A winking George Washington would never be seriously considered, but one possibility is changeable wording on the Federal Reserve seal on the left front of bills.

— The tinted backgrounds, though Treasury spokesman Robert Levine says the idea of brighter colors was discarded after being "kicked around."

— Coded, metallic threads that special machines could read, thus detecting counterfeits. However, that wouldn't be much help to people who casually pay out and accept cash every day.

Paul also objected to the idea of such threads or metallic strips on privacy grounds, implying that the government might use it to monitor cash being taken out of the country.

"Americans must have the freedom to travel out of the United States without any restrictions," he said. And he said any attempt to impose restrictions would be "outrageous and a violation of our rights."

His comments seemed to indicate that any major currency change, which would require congressional approval, would not be made without debate.

Levine and other officials have said that a switchover to new currency would take about two years after final decisions are made.

Apparently the new bills would be printed and injected into the economy gradually with old bills continuing to be legal tender.

Secret Service officials, responsible for fighting counterfeiting, have suggested such a drawn-out process could be a problem since bogus copies of the old bills could still be turned out. But Levine said no sudden call-in of old currency was likely.

Since the size of U.S. currency was reduced in 1929, only minor changes have been made, such as the addition of the words "In God We Trust" three decades ago.

Manuscript sells for record $11.8 million

By The Associated Press

LONDON — A lavishly illustrated 12th century book of Gospels set a world record price for an art work Tuesday when a West German government consortium paid 7.4 million pounds — $10.7 million — for the illuminated manuscript.

Sotheby's auction house said that with its 10 percent commission added, the buyers will pay 8.14 million pounds — $11.8 million.

"We got a real bargain," said Hans Kraus, 77-year-old head of the New York based H.P. Kraus book-dealing firm, which jointly bid for "The Gospels of Henry the Lion" with London's Bernard Quaritch Ltd. bookdealers, on behalf of the Bonn government.

The consortium was backed mainly by the West German state of Lower Saxony where the book of the four Gospels was produced by a monk named Herimann, near Brunswick in about 1170.

"The manuscript is going back to Lower Saxony where it belongs and where it is going to stay," Hermann Abs, honorary chairman of Deutsche Bank and spokesman for the consortium, told reporters.

He said the consortium included the German federal government, the state of Bavaria, the Prussian Cultural Foundation and private donors.

Sotheby's would not identify the seller, but a spokesman said the work probably had no more than six owners in 800 years.

From the first bid of 1 million pounds ($1.44 million) it took only a hushed one minute and 58 seconds to sell the volume — which Sotheby's had expected would fetch around 3 million pounds ($4.35 million).

The Paul Getty foundation of California was the consortium's biggest competitor, according to an art dealer who declined to be identified.

The book's price dwarfed the previous record for an art work. That was set May 30, 1960, when an unidentified Argentine collector paid $6.4 million for the painting "Juliet and Her Nurse" by the British artist J.M.W. Turner.

The pages contain 41 illustrations and more than 1,500 illuminated initials, painted in red, blue and green and highlighted with gold and silver.

Top court hears seniority dispute

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The city of Memphis, Tenn., a firefighters union and the Reagan administration urged the Supreme Court Tuesday to protect "innocent whites" from layoffs to preserve jobs for blacks with less seniority.

"It would make no sense at all to ignore seniority," Rex Lee, the Justice Department's top-ranking courtroom lawyer, told the court.

In 1979, the court said in a Louisiana case that employers voluntarily may give minority workers special treatment in hiring, training and promotion — sometimes even to the extent of using racial quotas.

But several justices spent a substantial portion of the 60-minute argument session wondering aloud whether a seniority dispute involving the Memphis Fire Department is the proper case to resolve a race relations question growing out of hard times.

May employers be barred by federal courts from laying off black workers when the result is lost jobs for whites with more seniority? Lower courts have answered "yes."

Texas tops AP team with four players

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Four players from the University of Texas and two each from Nebraska — including Heisman Trophy-winner Mike Rozier — and Brigham Young were named Monday to the 1983 Associated Press All-America college football team.

The 24-man team, which consists of 19 seniors, four juniors and sophomore running back Vincent "Bo" Jackson of Auburn, also features quarterback Steve Young of Brigham Young, who led the nation in total offense with 4,346 yards and an NCAA record 395.1 yards per game.

The Texas players are offensive guard Doug Dawson, along with three members of the nation's No. 1-ranked defense — linebacker Jeff Leiding, cornerback Mossy Cade and free safety Jerry Gray.

Only once before since the AP All-American began in 1925 has a school placed as many as four players on the All-America team. That was in 1945 when Army put five players on what was then an 11-man All-America team.

Since the All-America squad has consisted of both offensive and defensive teams — from 1950-52 and beginning again in 1964 — only Oklahoma, with three defenders in 1975, and Michigan, with three members on offense in 1981, have placed three players on one unit.

The AP All-America team will be featured Monday, Dec. 19, on Bob Hope's Christmas show (NBC-TV, 7-8 p.m., CST). Nebraska's representative besides Rozier is wide receiver Irving Fryar. The other BYU player in addition to Young is tight end Gordon Hudson, one of four repeaters on the AP All-America team. The others who made the team for the second year in a row are offensive tackle Bill Fralic of Pittsburgh, outside linebacker Wilber Marshall of Florida and inside linebacker Ricky Hunley of Arizona.

The juniors are Gray, Fralic, placekicker Luis Zendejas of Arizona State and middle guard William Perry of Clemson.

The rest of the offense consists of wide receiver Gerald McNeil of Baylor, tackle Brian Blados of North Carolina, guard Terry Long of East Carolina and center Tom Dixon of Michigan.

Others on defense are outside linebacker Ron Rivera of California, tackles Rick Bryan of Oklahoma and Reggie White of Tennessee, inside linebacker Carl Banks of Michigan State, deep back Russell Carter of Southern Methodist and punter Jack Weil of Wyoming.

Rozier, Bryan and Carter all moved up from the 1982 second team to this year's first team, while Perry jumped from the third team to the first unit. Penn State wide receiver Kenny Jackson made the second unit this year after being a first-teamer in 1982 and roverback Terry Hoage of Georgia is on the 1983 honorable mention list.

Small size makes no difference

By SEAN REILLY
Sports Editor

In the world of basketball, those who follow the sport usually can expect players to range anywhere in size from 6-feet to 7-feet.

However, during last Saturday night's basketball game against U.S. International, from San Diego, Calif., the K-State men's team and its fans watched the performance of 5-foot-3 guard Zach Lieberman.

Despite the tall world of basketball, Lieberman's height has never posed a problem for him.

"My size has never been a hinderance in the game," said Lieberman, who began participating in basketball at the age of 7.

Since then he has remained in the roundball sport, including a stop at Kennedy High School in Woodland Hills, Calif., where he averaged 18 points a game.

This season Lieberman was averaging 8.3 points per game for the Gulls before the contest against K-State, in which he scored only one point on a free throw. However, Lieberman said he had reasons for his low point output.

"My job tonight was to run the offense," he said in the locker room following the game, which the Wildcats won 83-62. "The coach (Gulls' Head Coach Freddie Goss) did not want me to shoot today."

Usually a coach would be unhappy with a one-point performance from a player, but not Goss.

"He's the most consistent player on the team," he said. "I wanted Zach to run the offense for that reason tonight rather than have him shoot the ball. The point guard runs the team.

Zach Lieberman, the 5-foot-3-inch guard for U.S. International who averaged 8.3 points per game prior to Saturday night's tilt, is dwarfed by K-State's Eric Watson. Lieberman, who drew strong crowd reaction with his unique ball handling style, is considered the most consistent player for the Gulls by coach Freddie Goss.

"If I had to vote on the Most Valuable Player right now, I would easily select Zach for the award. He has played every game."

During a game, Lieberman said he most enjoys the chance to go one-on-one with the opposing player, adding that he is "in there to get the ball to the other end."

As fans witnessed several times the other night, Lieberman has his own style when bringing the ball down the court.

Dribbling the basketball between his leg once, then suddenly switching his feet and again dribbling the ball between his leg, Lieberman brought applause and yells from the crowd.

"I do that to intimidate the opposing player. It shows I am a good ball-handler. It's also a way of psyching myself up for the game," he said.

When asked whether opposing players ever take his size for granted, Lieberman was quick to point out that he thinks many do not.

"When the other teams receive the scouting report on us, they can obviously see that I am no fluke. I believe they respect me as a basketball player," he said.

The performance has brought not just cheers from the crowd, but during one moment when a teammate was shooting a foul shot, fans struck up a conversation with Lieberman.

"I like talking to the crowd. They usually don't say anything mean. They were nice tonight."

"Everywhere I play, I usually end up talking to the fans."

On Lieberman's size, Goss said that opposing players rarely take advantage of his short stature.

"They usually don't take advantage of his size. In fact, only one time tonight did K-State take advantage, and they ended up fouling him."

Want To Sell Your Books ?

Question: How does the Union Bookstore determine how much your books are worth when you sell them back?

Answer: If the Bookstore has notification from the instructor that the books are to be re-adopted for use the next semester, and if the Bookstore does not already have a sufficient stock on hand, then you will be offered 60% of the publisher's current list price.

For example: If a book sells for $10 new and it meets the requirements noted above, the book would be bought from you for $6.

If the Bookstore has not received notice that the book will be used again, or if it already has a sufficient stock on hand, the book would be worth the current wholesale price as indicated by one of the nation's largest jobbers of used textbooks.

If you have any questions about the price being paid for a textbook, the buyer will be happy to answer any questions which you may have regarding the price paid.

Question: Is 80% the usual price paid for textbooks around the country?

Answer: Definitely not. Most stores in the United States pay only 50% for books being used again. The Union Bookstore is one of the few stores which pays 60%. And remember, we pay cash. You don't have to take your money out in trade.

Question: What about paperbacks? Does the 60% policy apply to them too?

Answer: Yes. The Union Bookstore does not penalize you on paperbacks. If they are being used again, and if the bookstore needs them, you will receive 60% of the publisher's list price.

Question: If the publisher's price has gone up since I bought my books, will I receive the benefit of that price increase?

Answer: Yes. For instance, if you bought your book for $9 and the publisher's list price is now $10, you will get $6, not $5.40.

Pictures return to student IDs in April

By MIKE HEDGES
Collegian Reporter

Beginning in April 1984, students will again have their pictures on their student identification cards.

"When students go for pre-registration, there will be an area set up in Farrell Library where they will have their pictures taken," said Jerry Katlin, student body president and graduate in public administration.

All students, even those with pictures already on their cards, will be required to get new identification cards.

"The new card will have everything the old cards had, but a few things will be added. A library identification number will be put on so it will be easier to check books out, and also a magnetic stripe will be added so eventually, when the whole University is under one computer system, it will be easier to do things like cash a check," Katlin said.

In 1981 Student Senate decided to take the pictures off the IDs so the $2 taken from each student's fees to pay for the card could be used for other purposes. At that time it was also decided that the picture on the card wasn't necessary and problems that students would encounter without the picture ID weren't anticipated, Katlin said.

"It is kind of a problem cashing a check if you don't have a picture identification, and also the Rec Center will be glad that this decision is being made," Katlin said.

The center's concern is that non-students are using the center by using students' cards, Katlin said.

The new card will be funded completely by the administration, University Registrar Don Foster said.

"The first card will be of no cost to the students. But if a student loses his card and gets a new one, it will cost him $5," he said.

Foster said there were two main reasons for reinstating the picture on IDs — a desire expressed by students and faculty to have them and the fact that many campus facilities require them.

"Some teachers require identification before a student can take a test in a class, and this will help," he said.

The new IDs won't be ready in January because the University is buying the equipment to take the pictures and it won't arrive in time for spring enrollment. Previously, K-State hired a company to take the pictures.

"We will begin taking pictures in April and will also take pictures of incoming freshmen and transfer students in the summer. By next September the picture identification cards will be completely phased in," Foster said.

Tornadoes tear into South, kill one

By The Associated Press

A double plague of tornadoes and floods hit the Deep South Tuesday, killing one person, tearing houses from foundations, flinging sleeping people into streets and reducing barns to matchsticks.

Scattered snowstorms, meanwhile, churned over the Plains and into the East and threatened to coat countless roads anew with ice and snow. A new, big chill turned the eastern Rockies into an icebox, with temperatures dipping to a bone-numbing 31 below in Colorado.

Sections of Selma, Ala., were leveled. A housing project and college dormitory were smashed. In LaPlace, La., 100 people were homeless.

The fury was unleashed in the darkness before dawn when nearly everyone was indoors, and some dazed, nearly naked residents stumbled outside in the chilly aftermath screaming for missing children.

The deaths stood at one and injuries at 15 in Selma, where 12 trailers, four houses and 50 new cars at a dealer lot were destroyed.

In LaPlace, 126 houses were damaged and 25 people were injured.

For D.C. Nichols of Selma, it began after he got up to hear weather bulletins and "the lights went off and we heard roaring. I said, 'My God, it's going to happen.' You could just hear it whoosh."

At Selma's Rangedale housing project, where the one fatality occurred, the twister hit a building and "it just fell down," resident Ella Jean Wright, 19, said. "I could see the debris flying up in the air. It was just horrible. Trees cracking and people running around and screaming and hollering," she said. "I don't ever want to see anything else like that in my life."

Clarence Chappell, 70, perished when a wall fell on him.

Nichols said he went outside to the middle of the road and found a little girl who apparently had been hurled from her house.

Kimberly Pettway, 5, was carried from the rubble by neighbors on a makeshift litter made from someone's door. She was hospitalized with a head injury and was reported in stable condition.

May Gordon, 74, from Selma, awoke in the road with an apparent broken back and asking why "someone was beating her and throwing water on her," said her niece, Renee

Blackwell. She was in stable condition.

The roof of a Selma University dormitory was blown off and three students were slightly injured. The storm hit as Alabama recovered from earlier tornadoes and floods that had claimed four lives.

There was even more destruction in LaPlace, northwest of New Orleans. "We were very, very fortunate we did not have any deaths," said Sheriff Lloyd Johnson of St. John the Baptist Parish.

Civil defense director Bertram Madere estimated damage at up to $10 million — $2 million of that at East St. John High School.

The Southern flooding, mostly overflowing streets and fields, stretched from Louisiana to Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia to the Piedmont. Flash flood watches were posted. Winter storm warnings were up for parts of Illinois, Wisconsin and Michigan.

The San Luis Valley in south-central Colorado shivered through a night of frigid temperatures, with all reporting stations recording readings below zero. Creede was the coldest at 31 below. Alamosa had 21 below. Center had 16 below. The low was 4 above in Denver.

Syria releases body of downed pilot

By The Associated Press

Syria released the body of U.S. Navy pilot Lt. Mark A. Lange on Wednesday but said the return of American prisoner Robert O. Goodman depended on relations with the United States.

Syria also accused the United States of direct involvement in the Lebanon war.

Meanwhile, bombs and rockets slammed into residential neighborhoods in Christian east Beirut from Druse positions in the hills overlooking the city. Police reported two civilians killed and 16 wounded by shrapnel.

The body of Lange, 27, from Fraser, Mich., was flown by the Marines to the aircraft carrier Independence off the Beirut coast for its eventual journey home, said Maj. Dennis Brooks, the Marine spokesman.

Lange's A-6 fighter-bomber was shot down Sunday in an attack on Syrian positions in Lebanon's central mountains. His body was delivered by the Syrians to the Lebanese army, which in turn handed it to the Marines.

Syria's state minister for foreign affairs, Farouk Charaa, told a news conference in Damascus that Goodman, 26, from Virginia Beach, Va., Lange's bombardier-navigator, was considered "a prisoner of war."

"He is well-treated in accordance with international rules," Charaa said. Goodman was captured after he bailed out of the stricken plane Sunday.

Charaa said the conditions for releasing Goodman, the first American serviceman held prisoner in Syria, depend "on the development of relations between Syria and the United States."

Charaa charged the Marines had become a party to the Lebanon conflict, saying Sunday's air raid "constitutes tangible proof of U.S. involvement in Lebanon and the one-sided position taken by the Marines in the internal strife in Lebanon."

Charaa reiterated Syria's determination to fire on U.S. reconnaissance planes flying over Syrian positions in Lebanon.

In Beirut, President Amin Gemayel again delayed a decision on whether to accept or reject the resignation of Prime Minister Shafik Wazzan and his Cabinet, which was submitted Sept. 26.

Wazzan offered to resign to make way for a national coalition Cabinet to steer Lebanon out of eight years of civil warfare.

Gemayel will visit Britain Monday for talks with Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher on the future of the multinational peacekeeping force in Beirut.

Thatcher on Wednesday reaffirmed Britain's commitment to the peacekeeping force. Italy and France, which also contribute to the force, gave no indication they will pull out.

In Athens, the Greek government said the Palestine Liberation Organization has chartered four Greek passenger ships to evacuate PLO chairman Yasser Arafat and about 4,000 of his fighters from Tripoli.

Salvadoran army raids rebel posts

By The Associated Press

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — About 600 government soldiers launched a drive against rebels in the south, and two soldiers were killed in the initial "sporadic clashes," military sources said Wednesday.

The sources said an air force plane strafed rebel positions Tuesday in the southern San Vicente and La Paz provinces near the hamlets of San Carlos and San Jose La Montana. They said they had no information on guerrilla casualties.

The rebels' clandestine Radio Venceremos claimed an American military helicopter on Monday flew over Torola in Morazan province, 110 miles northeast of the capital, from Honduran territory. The radio called the alleged incident "a new step of aggression" by the Reagan administration, which is supporting the conservative government here in its 4-year-old war against leftist insurgents.

More than 3,500 American troops are taking part in extended military maneuvers in Honduras intended as a warning to leftist-led Nicaragua that the United States will not tolerate the spread of Marxist revolution through Central America. The Reagan administration accuses the Sandinista government in Nicaragua of supplying weapons to El Salvador's guerrillas.

Elsewhere in the region, the Costa Rican government has protested Monday's machine-gun attack by Nicaraguan warplanes on a Costa Rican freighter.

The owner of the 600-foot Lyon Heart said the ship, which was flying a Costa Rican flag, was attacked 80 miles offshore while en route from Miami to Panama. No crew members were wounded, but some cargo was damaged, said Jose Luis Odio, president of Coordinated Caribbean Transport, which owns the freighter.

Beirut survivors return to heroes' welcome

By The Associated Press

CAMP LEJEUNE, N.C. — Marines who survived the October Beirut bombing attack returned to a heroes' welcome Wednesday from proud residents and happy relatives, some weeping tears of joy.

High school bands and cheering spectators waving flags greeted the 24th Marine Amphibious Unit, home after six violent months in Lebanon as part of a multinational peacekeeping force. Some 1,700 Marines landed at the port of Morehead City, then were bused 60 miles to their base at Camp Lejeune.

"It was really patriotic," Cpl. Levone Morris, one of the returning Marines, said of the welcome. "There were people waving at us all along the road from the port."

The unit lost 240 members Oct. 23 when a terrorist rammed a dynamite-packed truck into the Marine headquarters at Beirut International Airport and detonated the explosives, leveling the building.

Morris, one of the troops airlifted to Lebanon to replace those killed, clutched his 16-month-old daughter, Latoya, and his wife, Audrey. He had served in Beirut from February to May.

"He was just up and gone," Mrs. Morris recalled. "We were all in shock here (after his second deployment), but we're very excited to have them home."

Marines were dismissed from their units and rushed into the crowds looking for their families. Troops continued to arrive throughout the afternoon as relatives waited impatiently.

Not all the Marines had families waiting for them. Several walked to nearby telephones to call relatives far away.

Vacating schedules set for mall project

By LAURI DIEHL
Collegian Reporter

The first buildings in the downtown redevelopment project area must be vacated by March 1985.

At a public information meeting Monday night conducted by the Downtown Redevelopment Advisory Board, local land and business owners heard city representatives explain building schedules and relocation plans for the project.

Gary Stith, community development director, said the first 90-day notices to vacate will not be issued until January 1985, but not all businesses will have to move at that time.

"Some businesses on the periphery (of the project) can remain in their present locations until June 1986," he said.

Those businesses occupying buildings acquired by the city will pay rent to the city.

"Once the city holds title, it will be the landlord and rent will be paid to the city," Stith said. "It will not be higher than the existing rent."

The City Commission has already selected land appraisers and will soon begin acquiring land, he added.

"The commission will initiate acquisition procedures in January," Stith said. "It will take about six months."

The city must complete three steps to acquire the land.

"First, we must notify landowners that we will be initiating processes to acquire property," he said. "Second, there will be two property appraisals and a review appraisal. Third, the city will make an offer to acquire (the property)."

The two initial appraisals are checked by a review appraiser for correct appraisal procedure, then both are considered when the reviewer sets the property's fair market value. This assessment may be appealed, Stith said.

"After the offer is made, landowners are allowed to negotiate," he said. "But they should have evidence to indicate the property is of higher value than assessed."

Improvements made by tenants will be included in the appraisals and used to determine tenant compensation, Stith said.

"If a leaseholder and owner can agree as to which are leaseholder improvements and which are landlord improvements, the appraisers will evaluate them separately," he said. "If they cannot, the city will not decide. It could end up going to court in a civil action."

Karen Daley, redevelopment officer, said some relocation costs incurred by affected businesses will be paid by the city. Expenses paid by relocation assistance include relocation of property, dismantling of special utility hookups, moving insurance, special business licenses and new signs and stationery.

"If you take out a loan for moving expenses and are later reimbursed from this fund, we will not pay the interest," Daley said. "We will not pay for loss of good will, loss of profit or loss of trained employees."

The city plans to hire a relocation consultant to help business owners fill out relocation assistance forms and conduct interviews to help businesses determine their relocation needs.

The downtown mall is scheduled to open in February 1987.

Tenure: Faculty members strive for job security, freedom

(Editor's note: This is the first of two related articles about tenure. The second is a follow up on the Mahaffey case and contains University tenure statistics.)

By ALAN STOLFUS
Government Editor

Tenure is and isn't what it appears to be. What tenure initially appears to be is job security. A faculty member wishing to maintain a teaching position at K-State locks onto a "tenure track" and at the end of six years, if all has gone well, tenure is almost guaranteed.

But tenure has a loftier mission than just job security.

According to the Faculty Handbook, "tenure is a continuous appointment designed to protect the academic freedom of a faculty member, that can be terminated only in unusual circumstances and then only after due process has been accorded the individual in question."

Tenure is what allowed Ben Mahaffey, associate professor of forestry, to continue teaching at K-State through controversial times, but tenure didn't save him from eventually being fired.

Mahaffey was notified Aug. 18 that he had been recommended for dismissal and suspended from University duties effective Sept. 1. He is the first tenured faculty member since the University adopted the American Association of University Professors' tenure guidelines in 1947 to be fired and possibly the first in the University's 120-year history.

Tenure is misunderstood, claimed Robin Smith, associate professor of philosophy and state AAUP vice president.

"Tenure is not understood outside the university. It's sort of seen as a way to keep a job," he said.

"Tenure is a means to certain ends, specifically: 1) freedom of teaching and research and of extramural activities, and 2) a sufficient degree of economic security to make the profession attractive to men and women of ability," the handbook states.

Academic freedom, the freedom to carry out research and teaching without ulterior motives, also protects the faculty member outside of the university.

"The college or university teacher is a citizen, a member of a learned profession, and an officer of an education institution. When he speaks or writes as a citizen, he should be free from institutional censorship or discipline, but his special position in the community imposes special obligations."

"As a man of learning and an education officer, he should remember that the public may judge his profession and his institution by his utterances," the handbook adds.

Academic freedom guidelines in the handbook also point out that a teacher has freedom in the classroom to discuss his subject, but should be careful not to introduce controversial matter "which has no relation to his subject."

"There's a purpose behind tenure," Smith said. "It's to protect academic freedom. It has a justification, and that's if we are to operate an institution like a university, (then) there has to be academic freedom."

Pressure from outside the university might have more influence than it does if it weren't for tenure and academic freedom. The two elements take the pressure off the faculty member.

"You can't trust people to tell the truth under pressure. Students shouldn't go to a school where there isn't tenure because you don't know if they're telling the truth," Smith said.

"I know of some cases of the president getting calls here from groups who don't like what a professor is saying. The reason they don't like it is because the professor is right," he added.

Offering tenure to faculty members is not a requirement for universities but "virtually all of them do," Provost Owen Koeppel said.

"A college of any reputation would be hard pressed not to. It couldn't hire as good as people if it didn't," he said.

"One of the reasons teachers take lower salaries is freedom to do research the way they want to. You couldn't do that without academic freedom," Smith said. "If you took it away, you would find far fewer people going into those obs."

"No one has a right to tenure who doesn't have it. What they have is the right to be considered for it," Smith said.

After all, "tenure is tantamount to a lifetime commitment," AAUP guidelines state in the handbook. The University "seeks to follow the spirit" of that letter.

After a probationary period, six years at K-State, faculty members are available for tenure and can be dismissed only for "adequate cause, except in the case of retirement for age or under extraordinary circumstances because of financial exigencies," the handbook states.

"I don't think any school has tried to define cause with precision," Koeppel said, adding legal advice to educators is not to define cause. As soon as cause would be defined and standards set, an incident would arise that didn't fit those standards, he said.

At K-State, the conditions of hiring a faculty member are to be in writing and both the teacher and university should have copies.

"Those finally selected for tenure must have demonstrated that they are among the best-qualified members of their profession available for the position in question..." the handbook states.

If a teacher has served three or more years of probationary time at one school and is hired away by another school, it may be agreed that the new appointment is for a probation of four years or less, even though total probationary time would be for more than seven years, the guidelines state.

Academic freedom also extends to teachers on probation.

Tenure, however, is still seen by some as job security and gives a mediocre teacher a job to hide behind. Koeppel sees this idea as a bad reputation for tenure.

"At times that happens," he said. "It's not unique to a tenure system. But I don't think very much of that happens here (at K-State)."

But still, tenure is a goal for faculty members. "I think a person who aspires a career as a university professor — yeah, they want (tenure)," Koeppel said. But not all faculty members place the same value on tenure.

Tenure is more important to faculty members who would have a tough time finding a comparable job if they lost their current job, he said. But to medical school faculty, for example, tenure doesn't have the same priority because the faculty, being doctors, would be able to find work outside the university.

"We would say — we would hope — people are under constant review," Koeppel said, because there is no review system for tenured faculty. Departmental problems are usually quietly worked out, he said, and faculty counseled on shortcomings.

Several reasons exist for dismissing a tenured faculty member: professional incompetence, misconduct or unethical behavior, persistent violation of University rules and/or policy and "bona fide" financial exigency. Faculty dismissed for reasons besides misconduct or unethical behavior must be given 12 months notice of the action, handbook procedures state.

The Board of Regents follow AAUP guidelines to describe "non-reappointment."

"Termination of employment of a tenured faculty member, other than by voluntary resignation or retirement, is extremely rare. In such case the University upholds both the letter and the spirit of the tenure principles of the AAUP," the handbook states.

Plane crash at Madrid airport kills 93

By The Associated Press

MADRID, Spain — A Spanish jetliner got lost in fog and taxied into a Boeing 727 that was accelerating at about 100 mph prior to takeoff from Madrid airport Wednesday, setting off a fiery explosion that killed 93 people, officials said.

It was the second air disaster in Madrid in 10 days. One survivor of the latest crash, an American, said he thought neither plane should have been allowed to take off in the dense fog. The airport, which has no ground radar, had been closed to incoming flights.

Air traffic control officials said the collision occurred at 9:45 a.m. (3:45 a.m. EST) when an Iberia Air Lines

Boeing 727 carrying 84 passengers, including 40 Japanese, and nine crew members, accelerated to take off toward the north for Rome. They said the pilot, after apparently spotting the other jet approaching on the ground, just managed to get the 727's nose up.

Transport Minister Enrique Baron and Iberia President Carlos Espinosa de los Monteros said a DC-9 of Aviaco, a domestic Spanish airliner carrying 37 passengers and five crew, got lost while taxiing and collided with the midsection of the 727, went under it and burst into flames.

Spokesmen for Iberia, Spain's national airline, and Aviaco said 50 passengers and one crew member aboard Iberia Flight No. 350 to Rome died. All 37 passengers and five crew members of Aviaco Flight No. 134 to the northern Spanish city of Santander perished, they said.

Baron had earlier put the number of victims at 104, but it was believed the higher figure was due to a confusion in the names of the Japanese tourists traveling on the Boeing 727. An estimated 23 of the survivors of the 727 jetliner were hospitalized, officials said.

Thomas Goltz, 39, a Madrid resident who comes from El Paso, Texas, and his wife Sydney, 32, were seated in the back of the Iberia plane and survived the crash with minor bruises. Goltz, manager of the Singer Co. in Madrid, said neither plane should have been allowed to leave the airport.

"It (the 727) was just about to take off when we heard this big crunching sound of metal. The plane sort of broke up in pieces and smoke started to fill the cabin," Goltz told The Associated Press by telephone from his home in suburban Arevaca.

"A crew member was struggling to get the back door open. I grabbed my wife and jumped out when the door was open and we ran. We found ourselves in a sort of field with the co-pilot and a badly burned man. We wandered around in the fog for about 15 minutes and finally were picked up by some people in a jeep."

U.S. promises to pursue arms pact

By The Associated Press

BRUSSELS, Belgium — Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger promised the European allies Wednesday the United States would go "anywhere in the world" to negotiate an arms control agreement with the Soviet Union.

Weinberger also said he saw no advantage in merging the Strategic Arms Reduction Talks on long-range nuclear missiles with the talks on medium-range missiles in Europe that the Soviets quit Nov. 23.

And U.S. Secretary of State George P. Shultz said in Bonn, West Germany, earlier in the day he would be ready to meet Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko at a disarmament conference in Stockholm next month and will do what he can "to make such a meeting possible."

Shultz was expected to repeat the pledge today at a meeting of 15 NATO foreign ministers in Brussels.

Shultz and Weinberger are in Europe assuring NATO allies that the U.S.-Soviet dialogue will continue despite deployment of new U.S. missiles and the Soviet walkout on negotiations to reduce intermediate-range nuclear missiles in Europe.

Weinberger, speaking at the end of a two-day conference of NATO defense ministers, told reporters, "We stand ready to negotiate fully at any table in Europe or at any table anywhere in the world," to get a fair agreement to reduce Soviet and U.S. missiles in Europe.

Weinberger and the European defense ministers discussed the wisdom of merging the suspended medium-range talks with negotiations on strategic weapons, which resume in Geneva Thursday.

Weinberger told reporters he was cool to the idea of a merger, but added: "We are willing to negotiate anywhere — whether or not you put two groups in the same room or two groups in separate rooms seems to make very little difference."

The chief difficulty is to get the Soviets to "negotiate seriously," he said.

The ministers issued a communique calling for an early resumption of the medium-range talks, but reaffirmed their support for a U.S. goal of putting equal limits on U.S. and Soviet missile warheads "at reduced levels, preferably zero for both sides."

The ministers said the Soviet Union has expanded its force of SS-20 rockets by 300 warheads since the United States first proposed elimination of such weapons on both sides.

Most of the ministers reaffirmed NATO's decision to proceed with deployment of 572 U.S. Pershing 2 and cruise missiles.

The exceptions were Greece, which has opposed the plan since Socialist Premier Andreas Papandreu took office in 1981, and the Danish delegation.

Spain again reserved its position on the entire NATO communique because Spanish membership in the alliance remained under review by the Madrid government.

Hanging ends in hung jury

By The Associated Press

BLOUNTVILLE, Tenn. — With the jury deadlocked 11-1 for conviction, a judge declared a mistrial Wednesday in the case of two men accused of hanging an elderly church deacon during a $40 robbery.

Kelly Banner, 36, of Hampton and Donald Grant, 36, of Roan Mountain will be tried again March 12 on first-degree murder charges in the death of Ben Tester in August 1981.

Authorities say Tester was hanged from an apple tree in his front yard after he refused to give money to a gang of robbers who broke into his rural Carter County home. Tester's house was ransacked, but all that was taken was $40 from his wallet.

Six other people have been sentenced to prison terms ranging from 10 years to life for participating in the crime.

Judge Edgar Calhoun declared the mistrial after jurors said they could not reach a unanimous verdict during 10½ hours of deliberations over three days.

One unidentified member of the Sullivan County Criminal Court jury held out for acquittal, the jury foreman said.

"I don't recall in my 11 or 12 years as a prosecutor ever seeing a jury more distraught that they couldn't convince a lone holdout," said District Attorney General David Crockett.

"We will continue to re-try this case until we get a verdict or until the judge...stops us," Crockett said.

Calhoun denied a request to release Banner and Grant on bond until their next trial, citing threats allegedly made against Crockett and a witness.

AIDS creates problems for Haitian job seekers

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — Many Haitians are suffering from job discrimination, some even being fired, because of unjustified fears that they can spread the deadly disease AIDS, community leaders say.

"Us Haitians, we are poor, we are black, we don't have the power to deal with the publicity," said Ringo Cayard, who helps run a family grocery store in Little Haiti.

"By creating a stigma on this community, a lot of people are losing jobs or having difficulty in finding jobs," said Dr. Jean-Claude Desgranges, a spokesman for the Haitian Coalition on AIDS.

Of 2,753 cases of acquired immune deficiency syndrome reported to the federal Centers for Disease Control as of Nov. 15, 4.8 percent were among Haitians. Homosexuals made up 72 percent of those cases and intravenous drug abusers an additional 17 percent. Researchers say the disease, which breaks down the body's immune system, appears to be spread by sexual contact, contaminated needles and blood transfusions, not casual contact.

Haitian physicians argue there is insufficient medical evidence to classify all Haitians as a high-risk group. They say Haitian culture deeply disapproves of homosexuality and drug abuse, making Haitian AIDS victims unlikely to admit to either activity.

The physicians, represented by the 60-member Haitian Medical Association, also claim that unsanitary conditions in Haiti, such as use of unsterilized needles, could make the AIDS problem worse among Haitians there than in the United States.

"There are far more whites that have it," Cayard said Tuesday. "But it's very convenient to say, 'the Haitians, they have AIDS.'"

Support the March of Dimes
BIRTH DEFECTS FOUNDATION

"It's a tremendous problem," he said. "People are losing their jobs, people have been told, 'I don't want you here because you might have AIDS.'"

Dr. James Curran, director of the AIDS task force at the CDC, said Haitians are being kept as a high-risk AIDS category because "the figures sort of speak for themselves in the sense that they pointed out that 5 percent (of all AIDS cases) have been of people born in Haiti." He said fewer than 20 percent of the Haitian AIDS victims are homosexuals or drug abusers, other high-risk categories.

But he added, "Any implication that these people pose substantial increases (of transmitting AIDS) to others is misconstrued."

Cayard said Haitians were badly hit by job discrimination because many work in service industries and have close contact with people or products, such as hotels, restaurants and in agriculture.

No figures were available on the number of Haitians who might have lost jobs or been denied new positions because of the AIDS scare. But officials say the publicity aggravated an already severe unemployment problem.

The unemployment rate among the more than 20,000 Haitians in Miami's Little Haiti section is 27 percent, more than twice the rate among other blacks in Dade County and four times as much as the overall rate for the county.

Craft wants $3.5 million in discrimination appeal

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Former television anchorwoman Christine Craft, facing a retrial of part of her lawsuit against Metromedia Inc., asked a federal judge Wednesday to allow her to nearly triple the amount of damages she is seeking.

Craft, who left KMBC-TV in Kansas City rather than accept a demotion from the anchor job, asked U.S. District Judge Joseph E. Stevens Jr. to allow her to seek $3.5 million in damages, instead of $1.2 million, from Metromedia, former owner of KMBC-TV.

Craft has charged Metromedia with sex and pay discrimination, fraud and misrepresentation. She sought $200,000 in actual damages and $1 million in punitive damages from Metromedia when her case went to trial in July.

After two weeks of testimony, a six-person jury on Aug. 8 awarded her $500,000 on the fraud count, ruled against her claim of pay discrimination and issued an advisory verdict that Metromedia was guilty of sex discrimination.

Stevens set aside the jury award Oct. 31, ruling that Craft's demotion from the anchor job was not the result of sex discrimination. He ordered a new trial to begin Jan. 4, in Joplin on the fraud count, and he denied a new trial on the equal-pay claim.

In court documents filed Wednesday, Craft's attorneys said Metromedia would not be put at a disadvantage if the amount requested was changed to $500,000 in actual damages and $3 million in punitive damages.

Leasing relocation tops discussion of redevelopment advisory board

By LUCINDA ELLISON
Manhattan Editor

Leasing, appraisals and relocation were all discussed Wednesday when Mel Roebuck, of Forest City Enterprises, answered questions and concerns during a meeting of the Downtown Redevelopment Advisory Board.

Forest City is developer of the downtown mall. Because preliminary approval was recently given for a $10 million Urban Development Action Grant, the city and developer are continuing plans for development and appraisal procedures. The UDAG will receive final approval when a supplemental memorandum of agreement has been finalized by the City Commission and Forest City.

DRAB members, business owners and city officials were present at the meeting in which Roebuck described leasing negotiations.

"Those (businesses) who have been the most aggressive have written to us, some more than once (about mall space)," Roebuck said. He said he has received 25-30 letters about locating a shop in the mall.

The leasing practice followed will include setting up a leasing plan in which Forest City will seek distribution among various kinds of merchants. Roebuck said this distribution will be checked with local realtors and businesses.

In order to "round out the mix" of the types of businesses available in the mall, Roebuck said they will prob-bably pursue national as well as local businesses.

Because the mall is a one-level structure, the quality of locations available within the building will not vary greatly. "There will not be many poorer and better locations," he said.

Although locations will not differ a great deal, stores in the center core of the structure will have what is considered the best area. This area is usually given to certain kinds of stores, Roebuck said. Stores which are more highly sought by the developer may be offered better locations within the mall or lower rents, he said.

The board also discussed parking provisions outlined in the supplemental memorandum of agreement. In order to ensure that parking built for the mall is used only by mall shoppers, the proposal suggests requiring that other major businesses near the mall provide their own off-street parking for customers.

"Parking space is the life blood of the mall," Roebuck said. Each parking space is dollars to the merchant."

"My concern is that employees (not working in the mall) would park their car there (the mall parking lot), go to work from 9-5 and then leave," he said. "We do have to find some way of protecting ourselves."

Gary Stith, community development director, said the proposal would create a C-3 zoning ordinance in the downtown area. This ordinance would require establishments of 15,000 square feet or more to provide off-street parking within 600 feet of the business while still in the same zone. The ordinance does not require parking be located adjacent to the business.

Because this ordinance would apply only to businesses and not to buildings of 15,000 feet or more, those present suggested changing the wording from establishment to building in order to preserve mall parking.

Roebuck also gave an update on the design process. Architects have begun preliminary design of the mall, Roebuck said, which includes facades and the layout of stores.

DRAB members expressed concerns about the selection of building materials compatible with other materials in the area, scale of the mall in comparison to the area, the view from the entrance of Manhattan across the Kansas Highway 177 bridge, parking, landscape and the use of some natural lighting inside the mall.

In other business, the board discussed relocation of businesses being replaced by the mall. Stith said the appraisal process for those businesses is scheduled to begin in January. The process, including reappraisal, is estimated to be finished in six months. He also cautioned business owners who are considering relocation plans.

"No one should do anything with the expectations that they will be reimbursed before an offer (from the city) is made," Stith said.

Holiday sales rise due to economy

By DAVE MANCHON
Collegian Reporter

"Tis the season to spend money, fa la la la la, la la la la. And consumers are spending more money this year due to a significant decrease of inflation and unemployment since 1982.

"Business has been extremely good so far this holiday season. This year's holiday sales will definitely top last December's," said John Bellman, personnel manager of Wal-Mart.

Steve Shay, manager of K-Mart, said he believes his store also will experience better sales than last December.

"This year, consumers are buying higher ticket items such as video cassette recorders and overall higher priced name brands, such as Sony," Shay said. "Prices are not necessarily going up, rather consumers are spending more because they are buying better quality items, which in turn are higher priced."

"The buying surge of the consumer is definitely an indicator that the economy is getting better," said Roger Trenary, temporary instructor in economics.

Trenary said he believes that there are three major reasons why consumers are spending more money.

"First, the unemployment rate has been falling," he said. "As people go back to work, they have more dollars to spend."

"Second, (there) is a psychological factor termed 'consumer confidence,' in which people feel more confident about the economic future. This factor makes people feel as though they can afford to buy more," he said.

Finally, Trenary attributed the surge in holiday sales to a lower inflation rate.

Government statistics indicate that the 1982 rate of inflation was 3.8 percent, and as of November 1983, the rate was 3.0 percent. The 1982 unemployment rate was 10.8 percent compared to 8.4 percent recorded last month.

"The economy will continue to grow through 1984. Things may slow down somewhat after December, but it will continue to grow throughout the coming year," Trenary said.

"I think people are generally surprised how well the economy has done," Trenary said. He said he believes statistics indicate that if prices are up, they are up only slightly.

"I don't see why this surge in spending should not continue into next year. If merchants continue to carry the right goods, they should have good measurable sales," Shay said.

"Good weather is another important factor involved in continuing to have good December sales," Shay said. He said he believes the snow keeps consumers at home which accounts for lost sales that cannot be made up during December.

But Bellman said he believes the snow is helping sales tremendously.

"The snow is putting people in the Christmas mood which increases buying and selling on the part of the consumer," he said.

Illness threatens panda's survival

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Ling-Ling, America's female panda with the tragic love life, is seriously ill from kidney failure and anemia, and National Zoo specialists said Wednesday that her chances of recovery are very poor.

"It's difficult to say how long she can survive," said Dr. Mitchell Bush, the zoo's chief veterinarian. He said Ling-Ling is being treated with antibiotics and may undergo short-term kidney dialysis.

"She's very sick right now, and the illness and complications could lead to her death," Bush said.

"The possibility of long-term dialysis is not feasible," he added, referring to the medical technique of cleansing the blood artificially when a kidney is defective.

Hsing-Hsing, the zoo's male panda and Ling-Ling's reluctant consort, is healthy and in no danger of contracting her illness, which is not contagious. She has been given an emergency transfusion of Hsing-Hsing's blood.

Bush told reporters that Ling-Ling's illness might have been caused by her long-awaited pregnancy, which ended last July when she gave birth to a cub, the first panda to be born in the United States. The cub died three hours later while cradled in its mother's arms, the victim of fluid in its chest cavity.

He said Ling-Ling was treated with antibiotics for an infection after her delivery, and responded well.

Bush said the giant female panda does not seem to be in pain. Indeed, before the news conference, Ling-Ling could be seen sitting in her heated panda palace at the zoo, munching on raw carrots and bamboo, expertly stripping away the moist leaves and spitting out the stalks.

Photographers waited impatiently to take pictures, but Ling-Ling deftly turned her back to them and watched some enterprising sparrows vie for her breakfast.

"Her kidney failure is very perplexing because she doesn't look that sick," Bush said. "Basically, she looks a lot better than the data in the lab tests shows."

Zoo officials said a giant panda's life expectancy is about 20 years. Ling-Ling is believed to be about 14 years old.

Hsing-Hsing and Ling-Ling were given to the United States by the People's Republic of China during President Nixon's historic visit in 1972.

Nine-year-old loans car to daddy

SEAL BEACH, Calif. — Amy Barlow will have fun, fun, fun with the new Corvette she won in a contest, but it won't be new any more by the time the 9-year-old can drive it.

"This is as good as a Christmas present," the fourth-grader says of the car delivered about a week ago.

She also won $25,000 in the national Jack-in-the-Box restaurant contest, and her parents plan to put that away for college.

Amy says she favors selling the Corvette, too, and banking that money, but her father Jim says he wouldn't mind keeping it.

"I'll let daddy borrow it," the youngster said.

Her friends ask for rides, which her father provides almost daily. "I feel like a cab driver," Barlow said Tuesday.

Amy's spokesman was picked in a random drawing in October from among about 900,000 entries nationwide, said Jack-in-the-Box spokeswoman Kathy McNelis.

Fonzie acts as transvestite in play

NEW YORK — Fonzie in drag?

Playwright Harvey Fierstein has reportedly asked Henry Winkler, best known as the leather-jacketed, tough-talking Fonzie on television's "Happy Days," to play the transvestite lead in Fierstein's "Torch Song Trilogy."

Winkler and Fierstein have met several times, the Daily News reported Wednesday.

"Winkler told Harvey that the TV show has been canceled. Winkler loves 'Torch Song' and wants to do it," the newspaper quoted a spokesman for the play as saying.

The spokesman, who was not identified, said Winkler probably would join the play's national company and eventually join it on Broadway.

Ford, Kissinger enter show biz

NEW YORK — Former President Ford and former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger have entered show business — appearing briefly as themselves in an episode of ABC's television series "Dynasty."

ABC said Wednesday that when Ford, his wife Betty, and Kissinger all attended a charity ball in Denver the producers of "Dynasty," which chronicles the lives of wealthy families in Denver, decided to fuse fiction with reality by having the cast attend the benefit.

On the episode to be shown Dec. 21, Kissinger and the Fords each have one line of dialogue. Kissinger will talk with the scheming character Alexis, played by Joan Collins, who says: "Henry, I haven't seen you since Portofino."

Replies Kissinger: "That's right."

Ex-Beatle calls paternity suit 'fake'

LONDON — Former Beatle Paul McCartney says a paternity suit filed against him by a West German woman "has turned out to be a complete fake."

"I knew it all along because she had said we knew each other intimately for two years, but I couldn't remember her first name. My memory's not that bad," McCartney was quoted as saying in an interview published Wednesday in Britain's TV Times weekly magazine.

Erika Huebers, 41, has filed suit against McCartney in West Berlin demanding child support for her 20-year-old daughter Bettina, whom she claims was fathered by McCartney when he was singing with the Beatles in Hamburg.

McCartney has denied the charge and taken blood tests he says prove he couldn't be the father.

Shuttle crew to undergo testing

By The Associated Press

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — Four of Spacelab's astronauts will barely get a chance to kiss their wives hello today before being rushed on hospital gurneys to a makeshift laboratory for a week of tests.

When space shuttle Columbia touches down on a dry lake bed here following its record 10-day flight, commander John Young and pilot Brewster Shaw will get the usual heroes' welcome. They will shake hands all around and make a few remarks to assembled dignitaries.

But for mission specialists Owen

K. Garriott, Robert Parker, Byron K. Lichtenberg, and West German physicist Ulf Merbold, the return to Earth will be but a continuation of their busy routine conducting experiments aboard the $1 billion European-built Spacelab.

The reason is that many of their experiments were conducted on themselves — and ground scientists need to examine them thoroughly before their bodies readapt fully to gravity.

All six crewmen will walk down steps from the orbiter to the ground, and then be hurried to a dispensary for examination, blood sampling, and family greetings.

It's after that they part company — with Young and Shaw heading for the ceremonial stand — and the others taken on gurneys, which are wheeled hospital beds, to the Baseline Data Collection Facility at the edge of the landing strip, their home for the next week.

"It is critical that this facility be located near the landing site," NASA said, "since many of the physiological changes associated with space flight are rapidly reversible, once the crewmen return to Earth, and post-flight testing must begin as soon as possible after landing."

Nancy Lovato, spokeswoman at NASA's Ames-Dryden Flight Research Center, said scientists even considered for a time removing the four from the shuttle on stretchers.

The testing is designed to give investigators a before, during and after picture of what happens when the body is subjected to weightlessness.

The specialists on the Columbia crew ran through the tests at 90-, 60-, 30- and 11-day intervals before liftoff, and some of the same experiments were also performed in orbit as part of the mission of the European-built Spacelab.

Radio station fakes arrival of Cabbage dolls in plane

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — The arrival of 18 Cabbage Patch dolls on a charter flight from Dallas was faked by a Wichita radio station Tuesday, but a spokesman for the station says there was no intent to mislead anybody.

KEYN-FM said it found the popular but hard-to-find dolls in Dallas and purchased them for about $1,700 to be given away to listeners in daily drawings until Christmas.

The station promoted the arrival of the dolls at an airport gate, and local media outlets were contacted to send representatives to cover the event. The airport public address system announced the arrival of the dolls via a chartered Air Midwest flight from Dallas.

When reporters were allowed to view the dolls, they were strapped into individual seats in the commuter plane, but Program Director Ron Eric Taylor acknowledged Wednesday that the dolls had been shipped to Wichita by air freight.

The Associated Press carried a story regionally based on the faked report and the story was carried by several newspapers.

Taylor said he never told anyone the dolls had arrived from Dallas strapped into the seats of the charter plane. Asked if the staged arrival didn't create that false impression, Taylor said: "I think that was the impression. The point is not really where they came from (when they arrived). That's just a detail."

KEYN Manager Ken Clifford said Wednesday he has heard complaints from reporters about the incident but added: "...if you want to get the story correct, you have to ask the right questions. And they didn't ask the right questions."

"We apologize if we misled anybody. That wasn't our intent," Clifford said.

The station manager said KEYN made "one little error" by not dispelling the impression that the charter plane had arrived from Dallas with the dolls aboard.

Gary Adamson, president of Air Midwest, said Wednesday he agreed to participate in the stunt because of its promotional value.

Students prefer newspapers for information

By STEVE MILLS
Collegian Reporter

A survey conducted by the Research Methods class in the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications showed that contrary to popular belief, K-State students receive most of their news information from newspapers.

"The popular opinion based on research findings in the past is that university students just don't read newspapers," said Robert Bontrager, associate professor of journalism and mass communications.

"But the thing that has to be kept in mind is that the focus of this (survey) was on news, and the newspaper and news magazines are obviously much more news sources than they are entertainment."

The Research Methods class is required by journalism graduate students and is only offered in the fall semester. The class does a similar survey each year.

"What we were interested in with this survey was to find out where the K-State students get their news. In this survey we were comparing television, newspaper, radio and weekly news magazines," Bontrager said.

"What surprised me the most about this survey is the strong showing of newspapers as a source of news for the K-State students," he said.

The survey showed that 67 percent of the students receive news daily from a newspaper. Bontrager added that only 1 percent (two people out of 364 interviewed) said they never get any news from a newspaper.

The newspaper most frequently read by K-State students is the Collegian (65 percent), followed by the Manhattan Mercury (13 percent). The analysis also showed that part-time students read the Manhattan Mercury more than the Collegian.

Sixty-four percent of the students reported that they read two newspapers daily and one out of 10 said they read three newspapers daily.

In addition, 56 percent of the respondents reported that they get their news information daily from radio stations. The most listened to radio station was WIBW-FM (30 percent), followed by radio station KSDB-FM (8 percent).

"It was surprising to find that television came out relatively low as a regular news source," Bontrager said, referring to the 34 percent of the University's students who receive daily news from television.

Bontrager said that when analyzing television, two factors must be considered.

"The availability is an important factor when considering TV. Some students don't have access to a set," he said.

Bontrager said the other factor was that Manhattan is a city without a television station. If a student's television set is not connected to cable, news sources are limited.

The most popular television station among students was WIBW (38 percent).

According to the survey, 49 percent of the students rarely, if ever, got their news information from weekly news magazines.

Time magazine was the most popular news magazine among the 27 percent of K-State students using this source of information, with 38 percent, followed by Newsweek with 24 percent.

"In terms of comparing the four media, the news magazines are the one that might be called the most neglected channel," Bontrager said.

The international students tend to rate weekly magazines higher for analyzing and explaining the news, and 64 percent of the students thought that the newspapers were doing the best job in covering local and area news.

In state, regional, national and international news, over 50 percent of the students picked television as doing the best job, with the newspapers having a strong showing. The students also showed that they thought the newspaper was the most accurate news source (32 percent) with television right behind at 31 percent.

The survey was conducted Oct. 17-24 by using a systematic sample of 364 members of the K-State student body.

"This size of a sample would be accurate within 5 percent (95 samples out of 100)," Bontrager pointed out.

Want To Sell Your Books ?

Question: How does the Union Bookstore determine how much your books are worth when you sell them back?

Answer: If the Bookstore has notification from the instructor that the books are to be re-adopted for use the next semester, and if the Bookstore does not already have a sufficient stock on hand, then you will be offered 60% of the publisher's current list price.

For example: if a book sells for $10 now and it meets the requirements noted above, the book would be bought from you for $6.

If the Bookstore has not received notice that the book will be used again, or if it already has a sufficient stock on hand, the book would be worth the current wholesale price as indicated by one of the nation's largest jobbers of used textbooks.

If you have any questions about the price being paid for a textbook, the buyer will be happy to answer any questions which you may have regarding the price paid.

Question: Is 60% the usual price paid for textbooks around the country?

Answer: Definitely not. Most stores in the United States pay only 50% for books being used again. The Union Bookstore is one of the few stores which pays 60%. And remember, we pay cash. You don't have to take your money out in trade.

Question: What about paperbacks? Does the 60% policy apply to them too?

Answer: Yes. The Union Bookstore does not penalize you on paperbacks, if they are being used again, and if the bookstore needs them, you will receive 60% of the publisher's list price.

Question: If the publisher's price has gone up since I bought my books, will I receive the benefit of that price increase?

Answer: Yes. For instance, if you bought your book for $9 and the publisher's list price is now $10, you will get $6, not $5.40.

Nuclear war: America lacks proper civil defense systems

People can survive a nuclear attack if they are prepared and informed, said Del Petty, Riley County emergency preparedness coordinator.

"Unless Riley County was the central target of the attack, most of our people could survive the fallout as long as they knew what to do," Petty said.

"Your Family Survival Plan," a nuclear attack survival booklet published by Riley County commissioners, was distributed in 1971 to every family in the county, along with "In Time of Emergency," a disaster response handbook published by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Although off-campus students received handbooks, on-campus students were not considered Riley County residents in 1971 and did not receive books. Only one book was left in each off-campus mailbox, Petty said.

The handbooks have not been distributed since 1971.

"There has never been a sustaining amount of money for distribution of civil defense materials," Petty said. "Negativism and lack of interest on the public's part has caused ed program after program to be dropped from the federal budget."

Since ABC-TV presented the movie "The Day After" on Nov. 20, FEMA's Kansas City office has received 750 requests for handbooks, said Patrick J. Breheny, FEMA regional director.

"Maybe now Congress will take a new look at civil defense," Petty said.

"People still should be educated further in advance so they can have a survival plan and can follow it calmly," he said. "They should be able to handle it as easily as they handle a tornado or other disaster."

The federal government has an obligation to educate people in advance, Petty said.

"The public has to be educated about what to do in case of a nuclear emergency before one occurs," Petty said, "so if it does happen, they can react without panicking. The more people know about radiation, the better, less emotionally-charged decisions they could make."

The federal government has been reluctant to begin a nuclear education program so as to avoid creating controversy and inciting fear, Petty said.

The National Warning System (NAWAS) does currently operate a message system to inform counties in case a missile was on its way, Petty said. The military's computer base in Cheyenne Mountain, Colo., can detect a missile, or any foreign object in the atmosphere 30 seconds after it has been launched. In less than two minutes, the computer could determine exactly where and when the missile would explode, he said. This would give an endangered area at least 30 minutes to prepare.

NAWAS conducts a telephone roll call of the states every day to test the communications system between Cheyenne Mountain and the states. After receiving its call, each state conducts a daily roll call of its counties, Petty said.

The government also has a plan to instruct citizens of steps to take if a nuclear confrontation threatens. In case of pre-attack events, such as the Soviet maneuvering depicted in "The Day After," U.S. citizens would be informed of how to protect themselves should an attack occur.

The pamphlet, "In Time of Emergency," is available free by writing FEMA, 911 Walnut St., room 300, Kansas City, Mo., 64106.

Manhattan is risk area, potential target; city would relocate west of Junction City

Because its population is close to 50,000, the Manhattan area is considered by the federal government as a high-risk area and a potential target in a nuclear war, according to the pamphlet, "Crisis Relocation Guide," which has been prepared by the state of Kansas.

The vicinity northwest of Junction City has been designated as the host area to which Manhattan residents would be evacuated. According to developing plans, the host area would be prepared to provide food and fallout shelter.

The most likely targets are cities with military contracts, military support systems, such as the airplane center of Wichita, large cities and state capitals, said Del Petty, Riley County emergency preparedness coordinator.

If a surprise attack occurs, military bases such as Fort Riley would be likely targets, Petty said. If international events indicate war is a possibility, however, troops at Fort Riley would be mobilized, he said.

The evacuation plan and routes have been designed not only in case of nuclear disaster but also in case of any other disaster which would require residents in the area to evacuate, he said.

"Several years ago a train carrying a hazardous chemical wrecked in Wabaunsee and the town had to evacuate," Petty said. "A similar thing could happen in Manhattan and we would use these same routes."

In the event of a nuclear emergency, the pamphlet stated, the evacuation plan would only be used upon the president's orders to the governor of Kansas, who would announce when the relocation would begin. Over television and radio, the governor would instruct people in the risk area to travel either to homes of friends or relatives outside risk areas or to the relocation areas.

If an evacuation were necessary, each family would be asked to drive only one vehicle so that traffic would be kept at a minimum.

Persons without vehicles would be instructed to call 776-4413, the Public Works office, for public transportation. Persons confined to medical facilities and nursing homes would either be released in the care of relatives or transported to similar group care institutions in the host area, according to the pamphlet.

Evacuation routes from Manhattan to the host area have been designated, and emergency care service and traffic control units would be on duty along the route.

Although the designated route to the host area would be crowded with traffic moving west from as far as Kansas City, drivers would be urged to stay on that road, the pamphlet stated. Drivers would be advised against taking extra gasoline cans, as it would be a fire hazard. Service vehicles would assist those who ran out of gas along the way.

Union possibly safe in attack, director says

A surprise nuclear attack would likely cause pandemonium in the Union if many people were in and near the building at the time. Fortunately, the Union "would be fairly safe," said Walt Smith, Union director.

"We are a designated tornado shelter (and) we have a tornado alert plan which we would follow. We have concrete walls and floors and ceilings, whereas some of the older buildings, such as Anderson (Hall), have wooden floors," he said.

According to the plan, the staff in each office has a designated section of the Union building to clear and direct people to the basement.

The plan proved effective several years ago when 1,200 visiting 4-H members were in the building during a tornado alert, Smith said. They were all directed to the recreation area in the basement, and Smith said there was room for many more people on the bowling lanes.

The basement entrances could be sealed off with materials from the Union maintenance shop, he said.

"The Union is one building, like the residence halls, that would have a food supply," Smith said. How long the food supply would last would depend upon how many people would be there for how long, he added.

The Union also has access to the steam tunnels that run under campus. The tunnels would not be safe during a blast because of the electrical power system connecting the buildings, said Del Petty, Riley County emergency preparedness coordinator. The tunnels would be dark after an explosion, Petty said, but a person could live in them if necessary and they would offer access to other buildings.

Riley County fallout shelters no longer marked, prepared

Riley County's list of buildings designated as fallout shelters has not been updated since 1972, said Del Petty, Riley County emergency preparedness coordinator.

Public shelters were once marked with fallout shelter signs, but most signs have disappeared. Signs cannot be replaced until the Corps of Engineers surveys the buildings and declares their safety. The agency does not have the funds to do the surveying, Petty said.

"I can replace old signs that are still on buildings," Petty said, "but I am not an engineer and am not qualified to survey buildings for safety."

According to the Federal Emergency Management Agency booklet, "In Time of Emergency," dense materials such as concrete, bricks and earth absorb gamma rays and can protect living things from radiation. An adequate fallout shelter does not have to be underground if its walls are thick enough to absorb the radiation and its windows are shielded with dense materials, Petty said. The thickness required to protect people from radiation varies according to the type, size and distance of the blast, he said.

A three- to five-minute wavering siren would warn of impending nuclear destruction. Only sounded in case of attack against the United States, the signal means that people should take shelter immediately and listen to the radio for further instructions.

In 1971, Riley County had 85 public buildings, mostly in Manhattan and at K-State, which the Corps of Engineers had designated as adequate fallout shelters. These public shelters had space for 42,609 people, and the county's population was 42,300. In addition, there was space for 470 in homes with adequate shelters.

Public shelters in Manhattan and on the K-State campus no longer have food supplies in them. The crackers which were once stored in all public shelters were found to have no nutritional value, Petty said, and would only make people thirsty.

Local hospital drills ensure adequate attack protection

Manhattan hospitals have specific plans for treating a number of people exposed to radiation — they are required to conduct a community disaster drill each year.

In November of 1981, the community disaster drill included a simulated campus accident involving radioactive material. St. Mary and Memorial hospitals, Lafene Student Health Center, campus safety of the division of University Facilities and Del Petty, Riley County emergency preparedness director, cooperated in the drill.

"The drill was a surprise to most of the staff," said Donna Thurn, emergency room director at St. Mary Hospital. "We even had volunteer students playing victims."

"In a real disaster, we would follow the same procedures we followed in the drill."

The emergency room would receive a telephone call that an accident involving radiation had occurred and that ambulances were needed for an undetermined amount of people.

"The number of people we could handle would depend upon the severity of the injuries," Thurn said.

After receiving the initial call, the emergency room staff would call in off-duty personnel. Victims brought in would first be decontaminated outside the building and surveyed with Geiger counters, which measure the amount of radiation in the atmosphere.

"We would have to be very careful that radioactive particles would not get into the hospital building," Thurn said. "The health of the other patients would have to be considered, as well as the health of our staff, who would be needed to treat others."

Everyone's skin would have to be decontaminated with soap and water before they could be allowed to enter the hospital, Thurn said.

Victims would then be taken into the emergency room and treated for injuries, burns and radiation sickness. Even those who experienced the least amount of radiation exposure would suffer nausea, various degrees of burns and hair loss. More extreme cases may have damaged bone marrow, gastrointestinal complications and a lesser ability to fight infection, Thurn said.

In case of nuclear attack, persons living in risk area A should take Kansas Highway 18 to Interstate 70 and exit I-70 at interchange 298, Junction City. Risk area B should take Riley County Highway 901 to I-70 and exit I-70 at interchange 300 in Grandview Plaza, east of Junction City. Emergency service and traffic control units would be positioned along the routes to help direct the flow of traffic.

Note: The streets named on the Manhattan Map are designated as city evacuation routes.

Radiation dangers vary in strength

Intense light. Heat. And radiation, of course. These are the immediate effects of nuclear explosion, according to the Federal Emergency Management Agency publication, "In Time of Emergency." These effects vary in strength, depending upon the distance and height of the explosion, the size and type of the weapon, the weather conditions and the terrain.

Explosions close to the ground would cause tons of earth and debris to be drawn up into the nuclear cloud and mixed with radioactive particles, the pamphlet stated. The largest particles formed would fall to the earth within 24 hours.

Depending upon weather conditions and the direction and velocity of the wind, radioactive fallout particles could return to the ground hours later several hundred miles away, according to the pamphlet.

Upon their return to the ground, as well as after touching earth, radioactive particles would give off gamma rays, which can cause burns to the skin, nausea and vomiting. Radiation received from severe exposure can penetrate the body and cause cell damage to organs, blood and bone marrow.

More Russians than Americans would survive nuclear war

More Soviets than Americans have a chance of surviving a nuclear confrontation between the two countries, said Leon Goure, associate director of the Advanced International Studies Institute in Washington, D.C., in a press release issued in March.

In case of a nuclear war today between the United States and the Soviet Union, 110 million to 140 million Americans would probably die, but less than 20 million Russians would die, Goure said. Russian deaths in a nuclear confrontation between the United States and the Soviet Union would not exceed the number of lives lost in World War II, when 20 million Russians died.

Goure, who defected from the Soviet Union, is the leading American authority on Soviet civil defense.

"When they get to the point they think they can survive a nuclear holocaust, we are in danger of having one," said Del Petty, Riley County emergency preparedness coordinator.

Because of its limited civil defense preparation, the United States not only would be defeated in a nuclear confrontation, but also would become extinct as a functioning society, he said.

The United States has held the conviction that a nuclear war with the Soviet Union would end in the "mutual assured destruction" of both countries, Goure said, and has not supported an extensive civil defense program, as the Soviet Union has.

Because of years of civil defense preparation, the Soviet Union would survive a nuclear war "with its present government intact," Goure said, "and with sufficient military and economic power to carry out postwar reconstruction and to exercise dominant power in the postwar world."

In his article "Soviet Civil Defense: The Grim Realities," John G. Hubbell, an authority on military affairs, discusses six points which have contributed to the Soviet Union's expertise in civil defense:

— At least 75 steel spheres, containing power sources, communications centers, food and water storage and sleeping quarters, have been located and verified by U.S. intelligence officials. These spheres are near Moscow and are 600 feet underground, topped with earth and reinforced concrete. Similar shelters have been located near other major Soviet cities.

— For 20 years, the Soviets have been erecting their new industrial complexes throughout the country. Single factories are divided into many buildings apart from each other, and protected and accompanied by huge underground shelters.

— Civil defense education is mandatory from second grade through age 60.

— Russian factory workers participate in civil defense training for two to four hours a month. Workers wearing gas masks and protective clothing practice rescue procedures and learn to decontaminate buildings. Their training sites are constructed from fire-damaged buildings and debris which would be left after a nuclear exchange.

— The Soviet Union has underground food storage facilities located around the country.

— The Soviet Union could relocate its people over its agricultural territory, an area nine times larger than the United States could destroy with its nuclear weapons.

American estimates on Soviet civil defense expenditures range from 10 to 100 times that of the United States. Some foreign intelligence agencies estimate the Soviets spend 650 to 1,000 times the amount the United States spends, Hubbell said.

"I can't see why they would spend that much (for civil defense) unless they think they're going to need it," Petty said.

According to November issue of Emergency Preparedness News, the Federal Emergency Management Agency was granted most of its 1984 budget requests, but the amounts budgeted for civil defense fell far short of FEMA's requests. The area of telecommunications and warning systems was hardest hit, with only $18 million granted of the requested $42 million.

The newsletter reported anti-nuclear groups had convinced many congressmen that "most civil defense measures would be futile in the event of a massive nuclear exchange."

"Soviet leaders persistently call for a military posture that includes a war-survival capability," Goure said. "They see no point in being able to destroy an enemy if he is able to destroy them in turn."

The disparity between the Soviet and American abilities to survive nuclear war is becoming more pronounced. The United States must develop serious civil defense programs, although not on the massive scale of the Russian programs, Goure said.

With reasonable expenditures for shelters and crisis evacuation, at least 90 percent of the population could be saved, he said.

The United States does not need to uproot and scatter its industry and its work forces, but zoning laws could be changed to discourage more industrial clusters.

'Fact-finding' trips take Congressmen afar

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Caribbean and Western Europe are two of the favored destinations for senators and representatives taking the traditional "fact-finding" missions this year.

Tax money will pay for most of the travel. For instance, lawmakers, their wives, and some staffers, will fly free aboard Air Force jets. Nor will they be stranded on the ground, where U.S. embassies will provide the visiting congressmen with transportation and tour assistance.

Under congressional rules, however, spouses must pay for their meals.

Eight members of the House Ways and Means Committee headed early this month for an 11-day tour of the Dominican Republic, Costa Rica, Jamaica, Barbados and Grenada in connection with President Reagan's Caribbean Basin Initiative.

On that trip are Chairman Dan Rostenkowski, D-Ill., Reps. Fortney H. Stark, D-Calif., Wyche Fowler Jr., D-Ga., Thomas J. Downey, D-N.Y., Robert T. Matsui, D-Calif., Ronnie G. Flipppo, D-Ala., Guy Vander Jagt, R-Mich., and Carroll A. Campbell, R-S.C., according to a Rostenkowski spokesman.

The House Rules Committee will visit some of the same nations in January. That trip is especially noteworthy because it is the first such jaunt in at least 17 years for the panel, which serves not as a bill-writing committee but instead determines when legislation reaches the floor for debate.

Neither the committee staff nor the Rules chairman, Rep. Claude Pepper, D-Fla., would say who is included in the traveling party to Costa Rica, Peru, Argentina, Brazil, tentatively Jamaica and possibly, for a day, to Grenada.

On Nov. 26, members of the the Ways and Means trade subcommittee headed east for nearly three weeks of discussions of East-West trade problems with officials in East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Hungary, Romania and Bulgaria.

Rufus Yezzer, a committee staffer, said the group included Reps.

Sam Gibbons, D-Fla., James R. Jones, D-Okl., Barber Conable, R-N.Y., Bill Frenzel, R-Minn., Douglas K. Bereuter, R-Neb., and Sander M. Levin, D-Mich.

Two subcommittees of the House Appropriations Committee are planning trips next month, one to learn about economic development programs in Spain, Italy, Jordan and Nepal, the other to inspect U.S. Pershing 2 and cruise missile sites in Western Europe.

While some lawmakers headed for warm climates, others packed their woolens and went to cold weather. Joel Widder of the National Science Foundation said that Reps. Harold S. Sawyer, R-Mich., and James M. Jeffords, R-Vt., signed on for a trip to Antarctica early this month to view scientific projects sponsored by the foundation. It's summer in Antarctica, but that only means the temperature will rise to an average of about 35 degrees.

A group from the Senate Banking Committee was also visiting Antarctica as part of a three-week trip ending Dec. 18 that includes stops in New Zealand, Australia, Hong Kong and Singapore for meetings with government officials and U.S. business interests.

The party includes the committee chairman, Sens. Jake Garn, R-Utah, Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Chic Hecht, R-Nev., the senators' wives, two aides and Senate secretary William Hildenbrand, according to Bill Hendrix, a Garn spokesman.

Hendrix said that Hildenbrand, whose job is to keep the Senate paperwork flowing, was along to "make sure the trip goes properly and see details are taken care of."

Traveling under the aegis of the Senate drug enforcement caucus, Sens. Paula Hawkins, R-Fla., and James Abdnor, R-S.D., and three aides left Nov. 27 for a two-week trip to the heroin producing nations of Turkey, Pakistan, Thailand and Burma, according to Tina Evans, an aide to Hawkins.

The tour includes a stop in Vienna to meet United Nations drug enforcement officials and field meetings with Washington officials. Some of the same ground in Turkey, Pakistan, Thailand and Burma will be covered in January during a trip planned by the House Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control.

The Congressional Black Caucus plans a two-day trip to Grenada this month to see what can be done to help the Caribbean nation economically, according to Tracy Simmonds, a spokesman for the caucus chairman, Rep. Julian C. Dixon, D-Calif.

She said that Dixon will be accompanied by Reps. Mervyn M. Dymally, D-Calif., Katie Hall, D-Ind., William H. Gray III, D-Pa., and John Conyers Jr., D-Mich.

Other recess trips include: — Rep. William O. Lipinski, D-Ill., London, early this month for the International Maritime Organization's environment protection meeting.

— Reps. F. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and George E. Brown Jr., D-Calif., and two aides, India, Dec. 1-11, to view energy development projects for the Science and Technology energy development and applications subcommittee.

— Rep. Ron Marlenee, R-Mont., planning to spend 10 days or more in Honduras in January "to examine how our assistance programs are working," according to Marlenee's spokesman, Glenn Marx.

Not all trips are paid for by U.S. government funds.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Des Moines funded a trip to Israel and Lebanon in late November so Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, and two aides could examine the Palestinian refugee situation.

The United Jewish Appeal is paying to send Reps. Dan Glickman, D-Kan., and Lawrence J. Smith, D-Fla., to Israel for a conference of Jewish leaders this month, according to Connie Doebele, a spokeswoman for Glickman. As part of that trip, the congressmen were flown to Egypt for a chat with President Hosni Mubarak.

Taiwanese groups paid for Reps. Les AuCoin, D-Ore., and William Boner, D-Tenn., to make separate visits to the Asian nation last month, according to spokesmen for the two lawmakers.

Carlin requests resignation of tax board chairman

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Charles B. Joseph, chairman of the Kansas Board of Tax Appeals, today will submit his resignation to Gov. John Carlin ending a nearly 13-year tenure on the board, sources said.

Sources, who spoke only if they were not identified, said the 70-year-old Joseph, of Potwin in Butler County, is expected to resign his post, which pays about $44,000 annually. Joseph's current four-year term does not expire until June 1985.

Joseph, who was in Topeka Wednesday, would not comment on reports of his impending resignation.

"We'll have to wait and see," Joseph said. "I cannot comment on it now."

A source close to the governor's office said Carlin has made no decision on a replacement for Joseph, despite pressure from House Democrats and rampant speculation that House Minority Leader Fred Weaver of Baxter Springs will be named to succeed him.

According to the source, it is unlikely that Carlin will make a decision on Joseph's successor today or even by the end of the week.

Carlin's press secretary, Mike Swenson, would not comment publicly on the speculation.

"At this point, the governor has not received a resignation (from Joseph)," Swenson said late Wednesday. "Both the governor and Mr. Joseph have publicly stated that he may not serve out his term. At some point, Mr. Joseph will probably step down."

A former Democratic state senator with more than decade of legislative experience and a native of Newton, Joseph lives in Potwin where he operated a cattle ranch and farm, along with oil interests.

Joseph was quoted in published news reports last month as saying he had agreed to a request by Carlin to step down, but he would not reveal when he would make the move. Joseph also refused then to discuss whether Carlin had pressured him to resign, saying only that he told the governor "I did not intend to serve the full four years of this term."

Other Capitol sources said Wednesday they believed Weaver would be named on Friday to replace Joseph. They point out that a state law regarding the resignation of party leaders would put House Democrats at a disadvantage during the early days of the 1984 Legislature.

In order for Rep. Don Mainey, D-Topeka and assistant minority leader, to assume Weaver's duties during the month before the session, the law requires the minority leader to resign at least 30 days before the Legislature convenes on Jan. 9.

Otherwise, House Democrats are not permitted to have Mainey function as acting minority leader. Democrats say that is important because they deserve to participate and have a voice in organization meetings and decisions on committee assignments with Republican leaders.

If Weaver does get the post and resigns, a fight for his leadership position is expected and Reps. Marvin Barkis of Paola and Mainey are considered the top contenders. Both have begun campaigning among their fellow House Democrats for support for the job.

Each of the state's five congressional districts must be represented on the five-member Board of Tax Appeals, which rules on controversies involving how state and local assessors value property for tax purposes.

Joseph represents the 5th Congressional District of southeast Kansas, and Weaver comes from that area.

West Germans flock to see 'Day After'

By The Associated Press

FRANKFURT, West Germany — Some critics said the film was poorly made and badly acted, a "nuclear soap opera." But it hasn't mattered to West German audiences who are flocking to theaters around the country to see "The Day After," the U.S. made-for-television movie about a nuclear war triggered in Germany.

At least 250,000 people saw the film during the first four days of its release, said Patricia Wiedenhoest, spokeswoman for the West German distributors, Tobis. The movie, which opened Dec. 2, is showing in 100 theaters.

"Interest in the film is extremely high...much more than we expected," she said. "We have ordered 35 copies more because of the high interest."

Tobis, which paid $1 million for the West German movie, video and television distribution rights, has shrugged off some critics' charges that it is profiting from "scare tactics" in the film.

West German audiences, however, seem generally impressed by the film, which focuses on the town of Lawrence, following a nuclear exchange between the United States and the Soviet Union.

The film opened 10 days after the West German parliament, following a stormy debate, voted to deploy new U.S. nuclear missiles despite the objections of the country's vocal anti-nuclear movement.

The 500-seat Europa Palast in downtown Frankfurt is filling the house at nearly every showing, said spokeswoman Doris Amthor.

"We've been showing the film five times a day for the past four days, and the house is usually full," Amthor said.

"We are showing it with synchronized German-language translation, and audiences are very impressed and shocked at what could happen in a nuclear war," she said.

Moviegoiners seemed subdued and shocked after a midday screening Tuesday at the theater.

Petra Neuhaus, a 17-year-old dental assistant, commented, "When nothing is left — no doctors, no medicine — no one can help."

Grim-faced Michael Sturm, a 21-year-old student, said, "One can only hope that something like this never happens."

"Everyone should see it, so they will know what is going to happen to us," said Arno Schulze, who is in his mid-20s, like much of the audience.

An original English-language version of the film, which stars Jason Robards Jr. and John Cullum, is being shown in a theater at Frankfurt International Airport.

Elsa Fritz, a spokeswoman, said the 85-seat Airport 1 has, so far, sold out all evening showings. It's even attracted some airline passengers who don't have time to sit through the whole film, which runs nearly two hours.

"But in the evenings after 4.30 p.m. the house is full, mostly young people, and many American servicemen are seeing the film here," she said. The busy commercial airport shares runways with the U.S. Air Force's Rhein-Main airbase.

"I'm sure they come because it's in English," she added.

"The Day After" is running at three cinemas in Hamburg. The manager of the Mundsburg Theater, Gerhard Brunschier, said audiences are "always stunned. There's a continuous atmosphere of tension during the screenings."

Eva Besselmann, a cashier at Duesseldorf's 300-seat Rex Theater, said it was rare for a film to receive so much attention, with many young Germans lining up to buy tickets ahead of time.

"Handbills are distributed during the screenings opposing atomic energy," she said.

"It's a film that, unlike others, one doesn't forget quickly," said Ulrich Neumann, manager of a second Duesseldorf theater showing the film. "The public is shaken by it."

Two Munich cinemas are playing the film, including a 750-seat house that has been continually sold out since the weekend.

Weidenhoest said the average price for a ticket is about $3.30. "Theaters are charging the same prices they charge for other films, depending on what type facilities they have."

OUR TWO LARGEST COMPETITORS SEEM TO LIKE COMPARING THEIR TYPEWRITERS.

LET'S SEE HOW THEY LIKE THIS.

VERY SIMPLY, OLIVETTI'S ET225 ELECTRONIC TYPEWRITER IS THE BEST VALUE ON THE MARKET.

We've all heard a lot of breathless claims from IBM and Xerox about the memory and printing capabilities of their electronic typewriters. Frankly, we're not impressed.

Because capabilities like these end where today's office requirements begin.

The Olivetti ET225, by comparison, is designed for where office automation is going in the future. In fact, it's the only electronic typewriter that fully expands its capabilities as your needs expand. All the way up to sophisticated word processing.

The basic ET225 provides features to take repetitive tasks out of typing; automatic paper feed. A clock and date keeper. Automatic underlining and centering. A wider paper carriage than our competitors offer. Plus a 500-character memory and display window that help keep mistakes from reaching the page.

Then add the ProCart 101, a removable memory module, and the ET225 becomes a truly software-based typewriter. With expanded memory plus the ability to search back through the entire document to edit or make changes.

To upgrade still further, add the ProCart 202 with its applications-oriented software and you've taken a big step toward word processing. With storage of up to 64,000 characters. And the ability to move blocks of up to 1,000 characters from one part of the text to another, or simply delete them. You'll even have bi-directional printing. Finally, the ET225 can be connected to the ETV300, or Cupid. And you have all the word-processing functions most companies need at a price they all can afford.

With all this, can we blame IBM and Xerox for only comparing their typewriters with one another, and not with our ET225? Because, when you get right down to it, there really is no comparison.

Civil rights nomination irks Democrats

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — One of President Reagan's appointments to the Civil Rights Commission whose nomination died in the Senate last spring was recommended Wednesday to sit on the reconstituted panel amid cries of foul from Democrats.

Robert Destro, 32, an assistant law professor at Catholic University here, was recommended to the panel by House Minority Leader Robert Michel, R-Ill. Democrats who supported a compromise measure passed last month that extended the life of the panel said Michel had agreed to reappoint Jill Ruckelshaus.

Under the compromise, the speaker of the House and the president pro tempore of the Senate each name two members after receiving recommendations from party leaders in both chambers.

If House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., D-Mass., accepts Michel's recommendation, President Reagan would have the majority on the panel that he sought last May when he tried to replace three commissioners with Destro, John H. Bunzel and Morris B. Abram.

"This is exactly what we did not want to happen," said Rep. Don Edwards, D-Calif., who was floor manager of the compromise that was passed before Congress adjourned last month for the holidays.

One congressional aide said it was unclear whether O'Neill had the power to reject Michel's recommendation.

The Senate Judiciary Committee's refusal to confirm Reagan's three nominees last spring triggered the dispute over the commission. Last month, Reagan fired three Democratic members, leaving the panel legally powerless to meet because it did not have a quorum.

The standoff between the White House and Congress over extending the commission resulted in the compromise that gives the president and Congress four appointments apiece. "The understanding was that Ruckelshaus would be one of the Republican congressional appointees," said Pete Smith, a spokesman for Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., who helped negotiate the compromise extending the life of the panel.

"The understanding was that the other Republican congressional appointee would be an unnamed Republican, someone with a clear civil rights record. Destro is not a Republican," Smith said.

Mike Johnson, a spokesman for Michel, denied the GOP minority leader agreed to reappoint Ruckelshaus.

One Democratic aide, who spoke only on condition he not be identified by name, said the wording of the compromise makes it unclear whether O'Neill can reject Destro.

"That's a fuzzy area," the aide said. "As I understand it, he could only do that if the appointment violated the terms of the statute and the statute doesn't specifically say...that the House minority leader would appoint a Republican."

Democrats and civil rights advocates this week accused Reagan of violating the compromise when he failed to appoint Mary Louise Smith, a moderate Republican who supports busing and racial quotas to correct discrimination.

Lack of evidence ends foreign oil investigation

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department announced Wednesday it has ended a federal investigation of international oil companies because there is no basis to pursue "possible antitrust action."

Assistant Attorney General William F. Baxter, head of the Justice Department's antitrust division, announced the decision to close the 6-year-old investigation without any prosecution.

Attorney General William

French Smith and Deputy Attorney General Edward C. Schmults had removed themselves from the case to avoid any appearance of a conflict of interest because their former law firms had represented oil companies.

The investigation initially began in 1977 with requests for documents from seven U.S. oil companies and four foreign companies. The probe was narrowed to focus solely on the four companies which jointly own the Arabian American Oil Co.

Elder responds to pressure; Wildcats outlast Gentlemen

By KEVIN DALE
Staff Writer

The K-State men's basketball team returned to its familiar 3-2 zone defense to hold down Centenary's potential all-American Willie Jackson and outlast the Gentlemen 65-58 Wednesday night in Ahearn Field House before a crowd of 6,750.

K-State's sophomore forward Ben Mitchell was given the task of guarding Jackson and quickly found himself on the bench with three fouls in the first half.

With Mitchell out, it was up to junior Eddie Elder to take up the slack. Elder was up for the challenge as he came through with six straight points for K-State, giving them a 16-12 lead with just over 16 minutes remaining in the first half to pull the 'Cats away from a 10-10 tie.

Elder finished the first half with 12 points and six rebounds to keep the 'Cats in the lead.

Centenary, from Shreveport, La., kept up a pesky full-court defense to stay with K-State and only trailed by four, 35-31 at the half.

The Gentlemen responded in the second half with a more aggressive defense and cut K-State's lead to one at 38-37 when Elder began to take control of the middle.

Elder grabbed two offensive rebounds and laid the ball back in to put K-State back up by five at 44-39 with 13:35 left in the game.

Centenary increased its intensity on defense and it was Lafayette Watkins and Mitchell who provided the Wildcats with enough offense to keep them in front. With 5:08 remaining in the game, Mitchell hit a 16-foot jumper to give K-State its biggest lead at 58-48.

Wildcat guard Jim Roder made five free throws in the final minutes to keep K-State out in front and the 'Cats held on to win 65-58.

"I thought it was a hard-fought game," Jack Hartman, Wildcat head coach, said. "I thought we had some opportunities to put the game away, but that's to their credit. Defensively, we played a very good ballgame. We need to handle the ball better on the transition."

One of the big reasons K-State was able to outlast Centenary was the inability of Jackson to get in the groove.

Jackson finished the game with 17 points — seven below his average of 24 per game. Jackson only got six in the second half and fouled out of the contest with 2:09 remaining.

"I thought we did an awful good job on Jackson," Hartman said. "We didn't give him the ball with much room. With Ben (Mitchell) in foul trouble we had to switch to the 3-2 zone to get the second man on Jackson quicker."

"Willie Jackson did not have a very good game, and we need him hitting on all cylinders to win games against teams like K-State," Tommy Canterbury, Centenary head coach, said. "We are not a very good team against the zone. When they went to the zone we seemed to have lost our touch."

For K-State, it was Elder, Mitchell, Roder and transfer Eric Watson scoring in double figures.

Elder led K-State with 16 points and 10 rebounds, while Mitchell added 12 and Roder pitched in 11.

Watson was impressive all over the court as he finished the game with 11 points, 3 rebounds, 4 assists and 3 blocked shots.

"Coach Hartman said we weren't playing hard at the start so I decided to go out and provide the leadership tonight," Watson said. "I felt I owed the team because I only averaged four points last week."

"Eric is getting more comfortable with the system," Hartman said. "He had a very good ballgame. The team is making good progress right now. We need to quit turning the ball over so much and start converting some of our transitions."

Leading individual for the 'Cats in rebounds was Elder with 10 who also lead the team in total points with 16. For Centenary, Albert Thomas was the leading rebounder and Jackson had the game high 17 points to lead the two teams.

The victory put K-State one game over the .500 mark for the first time this season with a record of 3-2. Next up for K-State is the University of Wisconsin, at 7:30 p.m., Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

Yankees' manager awaits word

By The Associated Press

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — White House Chief of Staff James A. Baker III emerged Wednesday as the leading candidate to replace Bowie Kuhn as baseball commissioner.

Reports of Baker's strong candidacy was the hottest topic of conversation at baseball's annual winter meeting even as New York Yankees owner George Steinbrenner appeared poised to fire Manager Billy Martin and replace him with Yogi Berra.

In player trades, the San Diego Padres acquired three young prospects in a three-way swap with the Chicago Cubs and the Montreal Expos. And the Cincinnati Reds signed free agent Dave Parker.

News that Baker might switch jobs was ridiculed by a White House spokesman and President Reagan said he was surprised by the reports.

The possibility of the chief of staff succeeding Kuhn first came to light Tuesday when it was learned that the group delegated to find a successor to Kuhn was looking for a man in the nation's capital.

On Wednesday, a source with contacts both in baseball and in Washington, said Baker had emerged as the top candidate for the job.

"Apparently, he was the fifth or sixth choice (of the search committee)," said the source, who asked not to be identified. "And it looks like that's how far down they have gone."

"They (the search committee) haven't been very popular," the source said.

After several candidates higher on the committee's list had declined the job, the source said, the committee began to look for the Washington connection.

"Their main care there was the exemption from antitrust (laws)," the source said. "Also, there was the fear of a strike in 1985."

The source said outgoing American League President Lee MacPhail was "everyone's first choice." But, not only did MacPhail ask out, some owners also began to feel he was more important in his other role of baseball's labor chief.

As acting head of the owners' Player Relations Committee, MacPhail would direct management's end of labor negotiations next year. Management's concern over player relations was further exacerbated when union head Ken Moffett, perceived as a moderate, was fired and replaced by Marvin Miller, the former union boss who is considered a tougher negotiator.

Sen. Bill Bradley, D-N.J., and former Treasury Secretary William Simon, now head of the U.S. Olympic Committee, both declined the job, the source said.

Initially, the White House issued a statement that it said Baker had authorized. The statement said: "In the past three years, there have been several press reports of job changes for Mr. Baker, and we didn't choose to comment on them then, and we don't intend to start now."

Sixth-ranked women to host Drake

By VIKKI WATSON
Staff Writer

Hoping to extend its Ahearn Field House winning streak to 30 victories, the women's basketball squad will host the Drake University Bulldogs tonight at 7:30.

K-State, currently ranked sixth in the nation, will be looking to avenge last year's 82-79 overtime loss to the Bulldogs, who now stand 2-1 on the season.

Drake returns four starters from last season's 20-8 squad, including center Lorri Bauman, who finished fourth in the nation in scoring last year with a 26.3 average.

As a pre-season all-American pick by Street and Smith Magazine, Bauman holds seven of the National Collegiate Athletic Association's 20 tournament records and has scored 2,384 points in her career. She currently sports 29.3 points per game and adds an average of eight rebounds per contest.

"She (Bauman) is the type of player that once she gets the ball, she's going to score or get fouled," Lynn Hickey, K-State head coach, said. "The main thing you do is put pressure on the outside ball handlers to keep her from getting the ball."

Drake will also add the services of sophomore Wanda Ford — the nation's top freshman rebounder last season. Ford averages 14.7 points and 12.7 rebounds a game.

To counter the size of the Bulldogs, who will start four players 6 feet or over, the 'Cats will need defensive pressure and will get it with their use of a full-court press, Hickey said.

"They (the Bulldogs) have real good size (and) they're excellent offensive players," she said. "I think their deficit is their speed and that's what we'll have to go for with a full-court press."

Adding that K-State pressure will be starters Angie Bonner (14.5 points, 5.8 rebounds per game), Tina Dixon (13.5, 7.5), Barbara Gilmore (14.0, 6.8), Sheronda Jenkins (10.5, 2.3) and Cassandra Jones (10.5, 4.0).

Hickey also looks for a Drake zone defense to try and stop the 'Cats' strong inside game.

"They'll play a 2-3 zone and try to clog up the middle and make us shoot from the outside," she said.

Sorcerer protects Ahearn tradition

The magic of Ahearn.

Many people (including an amazing number of opposing basketball coaches) have wondered what the sorcerer of the field house is going to do to their team next.

The sorcerer may be Jack Hartman, but, more likely he is a being created by the souls of fans which have sandwiched into Ahearn since it opened in 1950.

Some of the nation's top teams have journeyed to Manhattan looking for an easy win only to learn that you don't mess with a Wildcat in his own den.

Ahearn is not a mammoth sports center that will seat the population of the free world, but that is where the magic begins.

There are only 11,220 seats in the field house. Actually, there are not that many; most of the seats are benches.

As many as 14,000 fans have jammed into the field house and, in 10 different seasons, the attendance has averaged more than Ahearn seating capacity.

So everyone cries for a new coliseum. Give the team better facilities and it will produce a better team. Give the fans more comfortable seats and increase the capacity and the crowds will increase. This all may be true, but where would the sorcerer go?

Surely he wouldn't travel to the new coliseum. The intensity of a crowd which is seated in Lazy Boy recliners is about as exciting as going to a yawning festival. If you need proof, go to a professional basketball game. There, you will sit back, usually in a padded seat, with about three miles of space to the nearest wall and watch little ants run around playing basketball.

Now, venture into the barn on the K-State campus. It's easy to find — it's the only building on campus that draws people in. Here, you will compress your body into its smallest proportions and try to fit into a space which usually cannot be fit into. If you can get enough room to sit, you will find the benches which made the man who invented chir-backs rich. So, with no room and no comfort, what are you supposed to do?

Just do what everyone else does — stand and yell your lungs out. The size of Ahearn allows the fans to form a bond with the team. When the fans are intense, the team is intense.

Mike Evans, one of the greatest athletes ever to don a K-State uniform, said the difference between pro basketball and collegiate is the enthusiasm of the fans.

"We have to look within ourselves for motivation," he said. "In college, the fans provide enough motivation for everyone. You never run into the same type of crowds in the NBA."

The Ahearn sorcerer would never allow the crowd to sit idle for very long. He forms a bond between the crowd and the team which brings about the victories.

Wildcat faithfuls have come to expect victories at Ahearn. K-State is 326-68 in the 33 years he has resided in Ahearn. That's a winning percentage of .827. There have been six seasons in which the sorcerer has refused to allow an opposing team a victory at Ahearn.

Of course, in his old age, the sorcerer is slacking off a little. Hartman is 147-31 at home which gives him a measly .826 winning percentage. Hartman has gone undefeated at home twice.

Last year, the sorcerer went to sleep and allowed the Wildcats to lose a record four games in a row at home. Now he has awoken and raised his wand to incite pandemonium as the 'Cats downed an excellent Oral Roberts team.

Even though there were only 7,000 in attendance, the crowd rose to the occasion and stayed behind the team.

In a sports coliseum with enough room to land a jet, the crowd would have needed Western Union to get its cheers to the court.

Eddie Sutton, Arkansas head basketball coach, has seen his teams fall under the sorcerer's spell.

"People don't realize how important a crowd is until they come into Ahearn," Sutton said. "That crowd is worth I don't know how many points to the Wildcats."

And then there is the infamous Bobby Knight, the head coach of the Indiana Hoosiers. Knight has heard the "Sit down, coach, sit down" cheer more than once. Knight has never lost at Ahearn, but he always leaves hoping never to return.

"This has got to be the greatest basketball crowd in America," Knight said after his team eked out a two-point victory over a much less talented Wildcat team.

K-State basketball fans are seated right on top of the court at Ahearn. This puts the fans in the game. The expressions of the players are easily seen. There are no bad seats in Ahearn. Even the upper-level seats have a clear view of the court.

In most new coliseums the upper deck is usually located somewhere in the ozone layer. My idea of excitement is not watching indistinguishable figures run around a basketball court.

Sure, the coliseum would be a great aid in recruiting and it would be more comfortable and would accommodate more fans and on and on and on. But basketball is an intense game and the crowd has the ability to decide close games. If you want comfort, stay home and watch on TV. The true fans spend most of their time on their feet anyway.

Bigger crowds cannot really be the issue. The crowds are not as big now as they were in the past. More seating would just make an already small crowd seem nonexistent.

I'm sure the new coliseum will get its OK and be built, but there will be a tear in an old sorcerer's eye as the magic of Ahearn fades into the past. Basketball at K-State will never be the same.

Holmes refuses to quit

By The Associated Press

PHILLIPSBURG, N.J. — Larry Holmes, the unbeaten World Boxing Council heavyweight champion, said today: "I'm not gonna quit."

The 34-year-old Holmes also told reporters at a news conference "I'm not going to be forced to quit by any organization or by any promoter."

Holmes feels that the WBC is putting undue pressure on him to make a mandatory defense against No. 1 contender Greg Page. He has agreed to fight Page in February or March for promoter Don King.

However, Holmes has said the $2.55 million offered by King is not enough and today he indicated how unlikely the fight was by saying Murad Muhammad now is his exclusive promoter.

If Holmes did not fight Page, the WBC certainly would withdraw championship recognition from Holmes.

Last week, Holmes talked about retiring. But since then he has changed his mind, saying he will continue to fight for the money as long as it is available and "as long as I have the support of my wife and family."

On Nov. 28, Holmes knocked out Marvin Frazier in the first round of a bout in Las Vegas, Nev. Holmes was angry that the WBC wouldn't give title sanction to that fight because Frazier was not a top-ranked opponent.

Ex-Shocker off to Italy

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — Antoine Carr, the Detroit Pistons' No. 1 draft pick, has signed a one-year contract for up to $275,000 with an Italian basketball club.

Wichita lawyer Chris Christian, representing Carr, said the former Wichita State University standout will get between $225,000 and $275,000 for playing for Team Milano this season.

The contract includes the use of an automobile, an apartment, airfare for Carr and his family and a disability clause guaranteeing payment in case of an injury, Christian said.

"He will be the highest paid player in Italy," the lawyer said. "After taxes, the actual money he'll make is about $75,000 to $100,000 more than what the Pistons were offering (in the first year of a four-year pact)."

Carr, a 6-foot-9 forward, was the eighth player picked in the June National Basketball Association draft. Christian and his other representatives said one of the reasons Carr's negotiations with Detroit bogged down was because the NBA club refused to guarantee the fourth-year of the proposed contract worth nearly $1 million.

Detroit retains the rights to Carr in the United States and plans to begin negotiations again during the summer, a spokesman said.

Since the Italian league isn't recognized as a professional league by the International Amateur Basketball Federation, Carr will retain his amateur status, said Tom McGrath, associate executive director of the U.S. Amateur Basketball Association.

Christian said Carr already has been contacted by the U.S. Olympic Committee and will try out for the U.S. Olympic basketball team.

Tina Dixon, sophomore center from Kansas City, Mo., works on her ball handling skills at Tuesday's practice. Dixon, at 6 feet 3 inches, is the tallest woman to ever play basketball at K-State.

'Laid-back' Dixon leads women's team

By VIKKI WATSON
Staff Writer

Women's basketball coach Lynn Hickey calls Tina Dixon a lanky kid — sometimes really energetic and at other times really laid-back.

Tina Dixon calls Tina Dixon "a crazy and outgoing person."

But just let the statistics speak for Dixon — they call her the Wildcat's leading rebounder and third-highest scorer.

And Dixon, who averages 7.5 rebounds and 13.5 points a game, indeed fits Hickey's description of lanky — at 6-foot-3 she is the tallest woman center to ever play basketball at K-State.

And playing the center position is nothing new for this sophomore majoring in business. She's been playing it ever since she started playing competitively during her freshman year of high school.

"One of the high-school coaches told me I was going to play," Dixon said. "At that time, I didn't know how a basketball worked."

She quickly learned how it worked, however, leading the Paseo Pirates to the Missouri 4A state championship in 1982 and being named as an all-league, all-city, all-metro, all-district and all-state selection. She was also named to the second team of Parade Magazine's all-American squad and the Adidas all-American team.

But Dixon hasn't stopped there — she came on strong last year during her freshman campaign, finishing second in the squad's rebounding department with a 5.8 average and landing an honorable mention on the coaches' all-Big Eight squad.

Dixon had a career-high 20 points last year against the University of Kansas and hit 15 in this year's recent contest with Northwestern University. The performances are typical of her talent, Hickey said.

"She's one of the best centers in the Midwest," Hickey said. "We're waiting on how well she'll develop defensively. If she'll add the defensive part to her game, there will be very few people better than her."

Dixon is quick to agree with Hickey when it comes to defense. It's currently something she is making great efforts to improve.

"I guess (improving) defense is my main goal," Dixon said. "I have to really get down and go get it. I have a tendency of letting people pound me out of the way."

Add Dixon's defense with basketball's all-important area of rebounding and you have a dominant inside player in the Big Eight Conference. She teams up with 6-foot-1 junior Angie Bonner to make a formidable duo, Hickey said.

"With Tina and Angie on the floor together it'll be a tough combination for anybody to stop," she said.

"This year my strongest game is my inside game," Dixon said. "(And) my rebounding has improved. That's all I think about — boards, boards, boards."

And Dixon has had little else but basketball to think about since signing with the Wildcats more than a year ago. K-State's reputation in basketball and business, plus the proximity of the University to her hometown, were all factors in Dixon's decision to attend K-State.

"I had four or five colleges recruit me, (but) as soon as I came down here I knew it's where I wanted to be. I'm not one to be away from my home," she said.

Being away, indeed, caused adjustments — both in adjusting to a new home and to the collegiate style of basketball, Dixon said.

"When I came here I just wanted playing time," she said. "It took me awhile to get the basics of college ball. But I got down and started hustling. My time came and I got to prove myself."

Hickey said Dixon proves herself both during practice and during games, always giving 100 percent.

"She really wants to be good," Hickey said. "On the floor she can be really enthusiastic and she's able to push herself every day in practice. When she makes a good play, she really gets excited. It's fun to watch her play."

But basketball isn't always fun and games, even for the talented Dixon. The time demands can at times be tough, she said.

"I get tired of it a lot," Dixon admits. "Every day I get up and think what I have to do in basketball."

"All we do is eat, sleep, practice and study," she said. "It's not really hard to do if you want to do these things."

"You just have to push yourself to do it. When I hit the court my morale's back up."

It definitely doesn't take much morale boosting when Dixon reflects on her teammates and the squad's chances at success — she has full confidence in their shot at the national championship.

"No. 1 — that's all I can say," Dixon said of the Wildcats.

Confident, yes; but not boastful when it comes to elaborating on her individual talents. There's always room for improvement, she said.

"I've always considered myself good and when it comes down to one-on-one," she said, "I've always considered myself better than my opponent."

"(But) I've got a long way to go. You never get too old to learn new things."

NCAA rule nullifies Dupree's '84 season

By The Associated Press

MISSION, Kan. — Marcus Dupree, the former star Oklahoma running back who transferred to Southern Mississippi this fall, apparently will have to sit out the 1984 football season.

A rules interpretation by the staff of the National Collegiate Athletic Association this week says Dupree will not be eligible until the 1985 season, when he will have two years of eligibility left, Tom Yeager, assistant director of legislative services, said Wednesday.

The interpretation was sought initially by the Metro Conference, headquartered in Atlanta, but Yeager said the NCAA received a similar letter from Southern Mississippi.

Yeager said either the conference or the university could ask for a ruling by the NCAA Council on the interpretation, but Athletic Director Roland Dale said Wednesday he planned no further action.

"Basically, we were asking them to interpret the rule for us. We were not asking for them to come up with something not in the book," Dale said.

"We don't plan any action of any kind. We wanted nothing other than their ruling," he said.

Yeager said the NCAA staff interpretation was that the fall 1983 term could not be used to fulfill the requirement that a transfer student spend two regular terms at his new school before regaining eligibility.

Dupree left Oklahoma midway through the 1983 season and enrolled at the school in Hattiesburg, Miss., in October.

"My evaluation of past precedents was that it could not be used," Yeager said of the current semester.

"In order to use a term of required residence, the student has to be regularly matriculated in a regular term. The university catalog indicated that registration for the fall semester closed in early September. Dupree didn't start attending classes until about Oct. 20," Yeager said.

Kansas City Kings try to sign Magic

Ever read those sports columns where the writer just lists a bunch of trivia questions, little known facts, predictions or just throws out his own biased opinions on things?

This semester I've kept a piece of paper with me and scribbled down things I've seen or read so that if I ever got desperate enough, I'd write about them.

Since there were no earth-shaking developments in the world of sports this week that jarred my senses, I've had to resort to my "list."

Lakers' guard Earvin "Magic" Johnson, the man who led to the use of the term, "triple double" — double figures in points, rebounds and assists — was nearly a member of the Kansas City Kings.

Johnson wanted to turn professional after his freshman year at Michigan State and would have been drafted by Kansas City, but the Kings couldn't come up with the "magic" bucks, and Johnson opted to stay in school another year.

HUEY COUNTS
Sports Columnist

Wondering if "Magic" ever had a "quadruple double" — the fourth double being turnovers — I looked it up, and he came close. One game he had nine turnovers to go along with 36 points, 14 assists and 13 rebounds. Johnson's 16 "triple doubles" last season led the league. The Celtics' Larry Bird finished second — with four.

I really enjoyed the movie "All the Right Moves," starring Tom Cruise, who portrayed a talented high school defensive back. The only thing I couldn't understand was that if he was so good, then how come he didn't know that tackling the receiver before the ball arrived was a pass interference?

George Allen, a former Washington Redskins' head football coach who was noted for his preference of veterans over rookies, was offered the head coaching job at K-State in 1949. Had he been hired, Allen would have sent all of his recruits to junior colleges and then reshirted them before he thought they had enough experience to play. Marcus Dupree, the Oklahoma-freshman-sensation-turned-transfer, wouldn't have stood a chance.

When Allen was a student at Michigan, he became a member of Sigma Delta Psi, a national honorary athletic and scholarship fraternity. Entrance requirements: a grade average of a B or better, swim 100 yards in 1 minute and 25 seconds, do a 10-second handstand, climb a 20-foot rope in 12 seconds, run the 120-yard high hurdles in 16 seconds, throw a baseball 250 feet, punt a football 45 yards, run a 5-minute mile, run the 100-yard dash in 11 seconds flat or less, toss a 16-pound shot 30 feet, long jump 17 feet and high jump five feet. Those guys must have eaten a boatload of Wheaties.

Speaking of athletic prowess, a Miami Dolphins' rookie quarterback reportedly threw a football 40 yards — behind his back.

There is no truth to the rumor that current heavyweight champion Larry Holmes' next fight is to be against the Macy's department store Santa Claus, who would be just another one of the walking zombies that Holmes has fought recently. I suppose Santa will have to "earn" his title shot like Marvis Frazier, Randall "Tex" Cobb and the rest of his previous living dead opponents.

By The Associated Press

GENEVA, Switzerland — OPEC oil ministers agreed Wednesday to keep the cartel's current base price of $29 a barrel and production of 17.5 million barrels a day, two members said.

"The commitment we have tonight covers production, quotas and prices," Indonesian Oil Minister Subroto said on leaving a late-night session. "We cleared it, cleared it all."

Gabon's oil minister, Etienne Guy Mouvagha Tchibba, added that "only a few more details" needed to be wrapped up Thursday. He said production ceilings and prices could be reviewed in the first quarter of 1984 if adjustments were needed.

However, other ministers said full agreement on prices and production had yet to be formally completed and members had several loose ends to wrap up when the conference resumed Thursday at the posh Intercontinental Hotel. They did not elaborate.

Agreement had been expected because the most powerful member of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, Saudi Arabia, said earlier that it would not charge more for its crude for at least two years even if the other 12 countries raised their prices.

However, Saudi Arabian oil minister Sheikh Ahmed Zaki Yamani, would only say as he left the OPEC meeting that the ministers "made some progress."

He earlier said that Saudi Arabia would not raise the benchmark price through 1985.

"I assure you it will be like this because we will never in Saudi Arabia increase our price, even if you have the majority in OPEC to increase it," he said.

Iran, apparently seeking new financing for its three-year-old war with Iraq, called for restoration of the $34 OPEC price agreed to in London last March.

Iran also urged Saudi Arabia to cut its production if necessary to ease the worldwide oil glut. Saudi Arabia pumps about 5 million of OPEC's collective 17.5-million barrel daily output.

Oil industry analysts say weak demand and internal fighting are pushing the 13-member cartel down the same road that forced a 15 percent price cut in March, the only one since oil prices spurted after the 1973 Arab oil embargo.

Farrell employs system to enhance operations

By ANDY SCHROCK
Collegian Reporter

Some students have been dismayed to find Farrell Library charging them overdue fines on books they have already returned.

"I couldn't believe it," Tom Hubbard, senior in graphic design, said. "I got a fine on a book that I had checked out and returned in the same week."

"I couldn't figure it out, so I went up to Farrell and got things straightened out. It was kind of a shock."

A computer-controlled inventory system in Farrell improves the speed, accuracy and efficiency of library operations "by a substantial margin," said Brice Hobrock, dean of University libraries, but it is not without error.

The name, address and academic status of a student must be registered on the computer in order to check out books. A label with a number that can be read by the computer is affixed to the back of the student's ID card (each book also has such a label). There is one number for each student; the new picture IDs in April will have this number permanently sealed under the plastic, Hobrock said.

"When you check out a book, you present your card and we scan it with an optical character reader. We then scan the book label, and the computer links the two numbers that relate the book to the person, and you're effectively connected to that book," Hobrock said.

To determine if an item is overdue, the computer is programmed to scan all of the stored information once a day and pinpoint overdue items.

The computer then prints an overdue notice that is mailed to the student, Hobrock said.

When a book is returned, a library employee scans the book with the optical character reader and "discharges" the book (breaks the electronic link between borrower and book).

"The link is permanently broken once you bring back the book — there's no record that you ever had it," Hobrock said.

Hobrock said he thought the problems with overdue books stemmed from human error rather than computer error.

"The other possibility is that the computer itself could fail to break the link, but that's not as likely as human error," he said.

The system, in operation since September, keeps track of circulated materials, loan periods and overdue books. It also assesses fines, creates overdue notices and checks out books to students, replacing the manual filling out of paper slips and writing overdue notices.

The reduction of human error in checking out and filing books was one of the foremost purposes of installing the new system.

"We have been using the conventional, manual method of inventory control, where a piece of paper is created for every book that leaves the building. This is an indication of who has the book (and) for how long."

The old system will eventually be phased out and replaced by the computer in about five years, he said.

Mexican group opposes national tests

By College Press Service

SAN FRANCISCO — Colleges that depend on standardized exam scores when deciding whether to admit a student won't be able to see any students' scores in the future if proponents of the Mexican-American Legal Defense and Educational Fund (MALDEF) get their way.

In November, MALDEF advocates asked the nation's three largest standardized test givers to stop sending test results to schools that require applicants to meet a minimum score on the exams.

But the test givers — the Educational Testing Service (ETS), the American College Testing (ACT) program, and the College Entrance Examination Board — all said there may be legal reasons why they can't stop sending students' test scores to specific schools.

MALDEF wants them to stop, however, because the current system has "the potential for screening out some very able people" from college, spokesman Annette Oliveira explained.

Setting "cutoff scores presumes that an individual scoring a few points below the minimum acceptable score has a significantly lower likelihood of success in college than does the individual scoring a few points above," MALDEF's petition to the testing agencies said.

Julio Franco, for example, was a high school academic honors student who couldn't get into the University of California-Berkeley's engineering school because of the school's combined Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) minimum score of 1,000.

Because Franco had 570 math and 390 verbal scores, Berkeley "summarily rejected" his application, Oliveira said.

MALDEF subsequently intervened in the case, and Franco was accepted by the school.

Estimating just how many schools do set minimum score cutoffs depends on which survey one views.

A 1979 study by the College Board and the American Association of Collegiate Registrars and Admissions Officers found that only two percent of the nation's colleges use test scores as the single most important factor in deciding whether to admit a student. Forty-three percent of the colleges judged scores as very important.

Thirty-one percent of the admissions officers called high school achievement the most important factor, with 34 percent listing it as very important.

But a 1980 study by the same two organizations found that 39 percent of the country's public and 42 percent of its private four-year colleges set minimum SAT scores for admission.

Approximately a third of all four-year schools have minimum ACT scores.

Using those numbers, Oliveira contended "the use (of minimum test scores) is definitely growing."

MALDEF supporters have not drawn up a list of schools they want cut off from test scores, but Oliveira named Berkeley, Florida and Texas as three likely targets.

Admissions officers at Florida and Texas conceded they use minimum test scores in screening out applicants, but also weigh high school grade point averages heavily.

"The stronger the academic record, the lower the test score required," explained James Parrish, Florida's admissions director.

Texas, like Florida, offers chances to make up deficiencies to students who don't score a combined 1,100 or meet other admissions requirements.

"In effect, we don't close off UT (University of Texas) to anybody who wants us," asserts Sterling Miller, a Texas admissions counselor.

Even the ETS, ACT and the College Board agree that schools shouldn't use test scores as the sole admissions criterion.

"To rely on the SAT or ACT alone is a tremendous injustice, not only to the students but to the parents and the school as well," said Thomas

Ewing of ETS. "We have always said from the beginning that the high school transcript is the best indicator of achievement."

But the testing organization's object is trying to punish schools that do set minimum standards.

Because students pay the testing services to send their scores to schools that they choose, "we would have to look long and hard at whether we'd withhold or deny access of test scores to colleges," ACT's Dave Crockett said. "That data belongs to the student."

"We would be violating the contract we have with the student" if some scores were withheld," concurred Fred Moreno of the College Board.

But College Board President Gregory Anrig said last week his organization would withhold the scores of teacher competency exams to states that use the scores to determine teachers' salaries and ranks.

Anrig was protesting a new Arkansas law that ties salary and rank to test scores.

"It seems just plain wrong to tell someone who has been judged a satisfactory teacher for 10 or 15 or 20 years that the passing of one test on one day is necessary to keep his or her job or salary as a teacher," Anrig said.

Playwright's travels aid school drama group

By TOM DOWNING
Staff Writer

Playwright Robert Patrick decided in 1973 he was determined not to be "under the thumb" of New York.

"I hopped on a Greyhound bus and started around the country. I looked everywhere for theater," Patrick said. "I found it in lots of places."

After the Broadway success of his play, "Kennedy's Children," he re-evaluated what he wanted to do with his life. Patrick started traveling on the behalf of the Thespians, an international dramatic group for high-school students.

Patrick is visiting Manhattan to participate in the International Thespian Conference at Manhattan High School Saturday and Sunday.

Thursday evening he participated in a discussion following the staged reading of "Sapphophers," a new play by K-State graduate Velina Houston. The production was under the auspices of Joel Climenhaga, associate professor in speech, and was directed by Jeanette James Saxton, graduate student in speech. Students participating in the reading were from Climenhaga's "Women in Theater" class.

Tonight, Patrick's play, "Kennedy's Children" will be presented at the high school. Phil Endacott and Jeff Friesen, both Manhattan High School students, are directing the production.

Patrick began his association with theater work, acting, directing, and eventually playwriting with the first off-off Broadway theater group called the Caffé Cino.

Currently, Broadway, off-Broadway and off-off Broadway are designations assigned to theaters according to their size. The large Broadway houses seat hundreds and have budgets in the millions of dollars.

The off-Broadway theaters have smaller houses and have thousand dollar budgets.

Off-off Broadway theaters could be anything under 100 seats with almost no budgets.

When Patrick began working with Caffé Cino in the '60s, the off-off Broadway theaters were ignored by the critics.

The stage floor at the Cino was a 5 by 8 area. He did "everything" for three years, he said.

"One day I just had an idea for a play. Since I was there, I took the play to Joe Cino and said, 'Do you want to do my play?' He said, 'No. Being a playwright makes you into a terrible person.'"

"He said I was a good guy and I shouldn't mess me up. But a bunch of other playwrights said, 'Come on, Joe, he works hard around here, let's do his little play,'" Patrick said.

"He did (the play). I loved it and wrote a lot more...He was right, I turned into a terrible person."

Kansas is the 23rd state he's visited this year.

Patrick has been called the most prolific playwright in the United States. Unlike many playwrights, he makes his living from being a playwright.

Before Patrick began making enough money from playwriting to work full time at it, he said he did "the whole route."

His last full-time job was typing autopsies in the New York City Morgue.

"I wrote a lot of plays while I was supposed to be typing," he said.

Instead of setting out to prove something, Patrick said he is moved by a certain situation and then writes about it.

"Nobody worries about what a painting means, in that narrow of a sense," he said.

"I never worry if my plays are comic or serious."

Traveling on the behalf of the Thespians, Patrick encourages high schools to produce plays written by their own students.

"I have a lot of faith in the young. I think they're getting fed up," he said.

Television and movies distort life and present nobody's version of life, he said. The producers write by "committee" and reduce the characters to either likeable or hateable.

"The ignorance, obtuseness, hypocrisy of the New York critics has distorted the American view of what's happening in the American theater," Patrick said.

"'Kennedy's Children' was ignored by the critics until it was produced in London. It went from London to New York and all of a sudden it was a hit," he said.

Producers in theaters around the country are reluctant to do a play that hasn't been done in New York.

"They wait for the Broadway critics to tell them what's good," Patrick said. "The dependence on Broadway has created a lack of self-respect in the rest of the theater."

"There's a validation, a sense of legitimacy, in New York, and that's fraudulent," he said. "Everybody's still waiting for New York to tell them, 'This is good.'"

"I walk down these halls and I see posters for old Broadway hits."

Even today, the off-off Broadway productions are ignored by the major press, Patrick said.

"New York has a stranglehold on the American theater. They (the critics) take something seriously only if someone spent a million dollars to produce it."

Staff/John Steeler

Robert Patrick, author of the play "Kennedy's Children," began his playwright career in an off-off Broadway group called the Caffé Cino. He is in Manhattan for an International Thespian Conference.

"For 15 years, Sam Shepard has been the most influential playwright in the world. These people finally discovered him because he won the Pulitzer."

Patrick's advice for aspiring playwrights?

"Get in touch with your fantasies, admit them, face them, love them. Write them down and if you're ashamed, you can cover them up in the rewrite."

"Write all the time. The same way a pianist runs scales."

Currently Patrick is working on a play about Michelangelo and hopes to have it in production soon.

"I learn so much getting out of the window box atmosphere of New York," he said.

The Fifth Estate Theater in Los Angeles has asked Patrick to run the theater.

"Oh, that'll be mostly keeping toilet paper in the bathrooms and light bulbs in the marquee," he said.

Astronauts land safely, set record

By The Associated Press

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — Six astronauts overcame a failed computer and a broken navigation instrument and landed Columbia and Spacelab safely Thursday, bringing to Earth a cargo of science treasures gathered in a record 10-day shuttle voyage.

The pinpoint landing on a dry lakebed runway came at 3:47 p.m. Pacific time — nearly eight hours later than NASA had planned.

"Columbia, welcome home, beautiful landing," said Mission Control as the spacecraft-turned-airplane coasted down, whipping up a cloud of dust into a clear blue sky.

"The good news is there was lots of beer waiting for you," the communicator added. "The bad news is we drank it eight hours ago."

Mission commander John Young, who at 53 was making his sixth and possibly last space flight, sounded tired after a 19-hour trouble-filled day and made only a businesslike response as the crew began shutting down systems.

President Reagan issued a written statement saying "the whole world is delighted to see Columbia and Spacelab back on the ground, safe and sound after a truly successful 10-day adventure."

"Well done!" he added. "Your great success is a shining example of what free people working together can do. This cooperative effort between Americans and Europeans will add to our treasure of human knowledge and be put to practical use, improving our lives on Earth."

The landing delay came after a powerful jolt shuddered through the craft early Thursday morning, followed by the failure of a computer and a device that gives key navigation guidance.

The astronauts were never in immediate danger, but Mission Control ordered the delay to study the problem and reprogram the four remaining computers.

Young, who was making his sixth and possibly last space flight, reported the jolt came during the firing of a control jet as he was preparing for the return to Earth on Thursday morning with his five crewmates, pilot Brewster Shaw and scientists Owen Garriott, Bob Parker, Byron Lichtenberg and Ulf Merbold, a West German physicist.

"I thought both those thruster firings were quite a jolt," said Young. Later, the veteran astronaut added: "It really hit the vehicle hard. ...It was really an impact type of thing, probably as high magnitude as we've seen around here in a long time."

Two computers failed in rapid succession, but Young and Shaw were able to restore one of them. The second was declared failed and turned off, leaving Columbia with four working on-board computers.

Lack of radar, lights major factors in Madrid jet collision

By The Associated Press

MADRID, Spain — Union and airline officials on Thursday cited lack of ground radar and multicolor warning lights Thursday as major factors in the fiery collision of two jetliners at Madrid airport that left more than 90 dead.

All 42 people aboard an Aviac DC-9 were killed and 50 more aboard an Iberia Air Lines Boeing 727 perished in the collision at the fog-bound airport Wednesday. A 93rd person, a stewardess, was missing and presumed dead.

On Thursday, government officials joined about 500 people at a funeral Mass for the victims at Barajas airport.

The field later reopened to traffic, but passengers on outbound Iberia flights did not receive their usual Spanish newspapers. Iberia said it wanted to avoid upsetting travelers with stories and photos of the collision.

Meanwhile, the president of the Spanish Air Traffic Controllers' Association, Mariano Hernandez, said the runway signal lights at the airport were not sufficient for conditions of heavy fog.

"We're not just starting to criticize these conditions now. We've been complaining about them for a long time," he told reporters.

Jose Antonio Silva, a pilot and member of the Aviaco board, said the collision might not have occurred if the runways had a signal system of multicolor lights, like many large airports.

Peter Kennedy, a British Civil Aviation

Authority spokesman, told reporters in London, "A higher standard of fog safety equipment would have helped prevent the accident."

Alejandro Barrio, a member of the union of Spanish Aviation Pilots, also said lack of proper signals was a determining factor.

"In 1977, following the collision in Santa Cruz de Tenerife, we asked the central administration to provide our major airports with modern radar systems. They said that would be done in one year. We are still waiting," Barrio said.

U.S., allies evaluate options in Mideast; impatience grows

Multinational forces agree to stay

Reagan considers Marine relocation

By The Associated Press

BRUSSELS — The United States and three allies agreed Thursday to keep their troops in Lebanon, but there were signs of growing impatience that the bloodshed was continuing despite the presence of the multinational force.

"We do not want to give the impression that we would abandon the Lebanese. We support President (Amin) Gemayel," said Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson of France.

But an Italian spokesman told reporters that his nation is considering removing 1,000 of its 2,100 troops from the multinational force. And a British official, who insisted on anonymity, said, "All along it has been accepted this is not an open-ended commitment. Our aim has been to create circumstances in which the MNF (multinational force) is no longer needed."

The renewed commitments of the four nations came during a breakfast meeting of foreign ministers in the suite of George Shultz, the U.S. secretary of state.

The meeting involved Shultz, Cheysson, Foreign Secretary Geoffrey Howe of Britain and Foreign Minister Giulio Andreotti of Italy.

A U.S. official said the ministers emphasized that the 5,600-man force is intended to improve stability in Lebanon and to help "establish conditions under which Lebanon can recover its full independence and integrity."

He said they agreed the two main priorities in Lebanon are national reconciliation and the withdrawal of all foreign forces and that they vowed "to do all in their power to promote this."

The premier of Italy and opposition figures in the other countries have expressed concern about their involvement after the United States on Sunday bombed Syrian anti-aircraft positions. U.S. officials said the bombing was meant to protect surveillance flights linked to the multinational force.

A U.S. spokesman acknowledged that the political stalemate and violence in Lebanon could exhaust the patience of "the various publics" if progress toward a solution isn't forthcoming soon.

The U.S. spokesman, who asked to be anonymous, said no consideration was given to pulling out the force. Nor, he said, is there a plan to increase the size of the multinational force or expand its role.

But he said the four ministers agreed on the need to achieve success in the Lebanese national reconciliation talks in Geneva, Switzerland.

BEIRUT, Lebanon — U.S. Marines wiped out a Shiite militia sniper nest and bunker in a fierce exchange of fire Thursday, and the Reagan administration said it was considering plans to move the Marines out of Beirut airport to safer positions.

The Marines retaliated when the northeastern perimeter of their base came under a sustained barrage of mortars, rocket-propelled grenades and automatic rifle fire at 9:26 a.m. (2:26 a.m. EST).

The shooting came from a position in the Shiite Moslem stronghold of Hay el-Sellum, and the bunker was destroyed with 60mm mortars, M-60 tank guns and Dragon missiles, spokesman Maj. Dennis Brooks said.

The Marines also shelled a building that had been used by Shiite snipers to fire at leatherneck positions some 150 yards away.

Brooks said the Marines suffered no casualties in the battle, which ended at 10:40 a.m. (3:40 a.m. EST), but the Marines remained in foxholes and bunkers on their highest state of alert.

Hay el-Sellum is a stronghold of Amal, the dominant Shiite militia. Shiite fanatics were suspected of masterminding the suicide truck bombing that killed 240 American troops at the Marine base Oct. 23.

The Druse control the hills above the airport, and Druse gunners were responsible for an attack that killed eight Marines Sunday.

Because of the attacks, the Reagan administration is considering plans to move the Marines away from the airport to more sheltered positions, spokesman Larry Speakes said in Washington Thursday.

Speakes declined to give details, but said no consideration is being given to withdrawing the Marines from Lebanon.

The New York Times said the plans include redeploying the Marines to positions south of the airport or to amphibious ships offshore, and that they came in response to domestic and foreign pressure.

Observers in Beirut said moving the Marines south of the airport would still put them in range of Druse batteries, but they would be more protected than at the airport. They said putting the Marines aboard ships, while protecting them, might tend to eclipse the U.S. peacekeeping presence in Lebanon.

In Rome, Italian newspapers said Prime Minister Bettino Craxi's government wanted to gradually reduce its 2,100-man contingent in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

K-State employees reach semifinals

Eighteen K-State classified employees have been selected as semifinalists for the 1984 Classified Employee of the Year. Staff and faculty nominated 62 co-workers to be considered from among 1,800 classified employees at K-State. The 18 staff members represent one percent of the total eligible employees.

The individuals were selected by the Classified Affairs Committee, a coordinating group of the classified employee recognition program.

The group of semifinalists will be narrowed to six finalists in January. Recipient of the $500 award will be announced at a ceremony next March 22.

The club's scrapbook and yearbook will be considered for national awards at the meeting. Anita Conley, senior in animal sciences and industry, will represent Kansas in the junior scholarship award competition.

The conference, which is sponsored in conjunction with the National Western Stock Show, gives students the opportunity to attend workshops, and conduct national business.

Open House activities to include parade, floats

By MATT MCMILLEN
Collegian Reporter

Planning for K-State's 1984 Open House began last May, and Jane Miles, student coordinator for the event and senior in accounting and finance, said this year's activities will be better than ever.

"Open House is going to be held March 30-31, starting with a parade at noon Friday," Miles said. "This year, awards will be given for floats. A lot of entertainment spots will be held throughout campus, with different entertainment in Durland Phase II, and in Justin and Seaton Halls.

"The residence halls will be more involved this year, and we will have the usual one hundred tables in the Union for student life exhibits. We are even going to have a hot air balloon," she said.

The publicity for this year's Open House has been expanded.

"There are 40 people on the media committee this year," Miles said. "We are going to use Aggieville merchants for discounts, and we will even have a billboard on (Interstate Highway) I-70. We're also going to use more radio and television."

Miles said media representatives are going to visit area high schools with slide shows and personal talks to encourage high school students to attend.

"The number of visitors is usually between 20,000 and 25,000," Miles said.

Open House at K-State is unique compared to similar events at other universities, she said.

"A lot of universities do something like this, but we are unique for taking a weekend for Open House," Miles said. "Many colleges combine Open House, Homecoming and band day instead of doing what we do."

Open House, now in its sixth year, gives the various colleges a chance to showcase their programs.

"Open House is not only for high school students, but it also gives K-State students a chance to see what other colleges (besides their own) are doing, and gives the faculty a chance to show off what they do," Miles said.

Miles said she expects over 2,500 K-State students and faculty to participate in this year's Open House.

Administrators gain tenure with policy change

(Editor's note: This is the second of two related articles about tenure. The first discussed the idea of tenure and this article offers University tenure statistics and a follow-up of the Mahaffey case.)

By ALAN STOLFUS
Government Editor

While K-State faculty members have enjoyed the set policies of tenure and academic freedom since 1947 when the University adopted American Association of University Professors' guidelines, administrative members supposedly had their own type of tenure.

But that administrative tenure was misconceived, John Chalmers, professor of economics, said.

Administrative members were awarded continuous appointments, just like classified employees, he said. Administrative members were granted continued employment after a six-year probationary period and could only be fired with cause — the same causes granted faculty members.

Chalmers, who was vice president of academic affairs from 1969-1980 (the position is now the provost's), said continued appointments had been awarded at K-State since at least the 1930s.

The University eliminated the continuous appointments in July 1981, but the appointments awarded before the new rule are still honored.

Of Kansas Board of Regents schools, K-State was the only to offer administrative continuous appointments, Provost Owen Koeppe said. Now, cause doesn't have to be cited in dismissing administrators, he said, but they have to be given a six months to one year notice, depending on how long they have held the position.

Still, offering administrators such a dismissal notice is more lenient than other regent schools, he added.

For faculty members, the University doesn't offer tenure to positions below the rank of assistant professor, but regular appointments at the rank of assistant instructor or above can be applied toward gaining tenure.

Although he said he couldn't speak for the University, Assistant Provost William Feyerharm said some universities don't offer tenure to instructors or lower ranking faculty because of the courses taught by those faculty members.

Faculty members with the rank of instructor or lower are often hired to teach introductory classes and the university wants to maintain a fluctuation of faculty members coming into those positions, Feyerharm said.

Also, because of tradition, academic rank is granted to library and extension faculty.

Of the 1,294.4 tenurable full-time faculty positions at K-State for fall 1982, 869.3 positions were filled. Of the total unclassified salary budget of $54,307,695, $29,103,268 was paid to tenured faculty members.

In a college by college breakdown:

— The College of Agriculture had 61.9 full-time tenurable teaching positions and 47.6 tenured faculty members. The college's unclassified salary budget was $2,399,054 and $1,708,524 went to tenured faculty salaries.

— The College of Architecture and Design had 42 tenurable positions but only 29 tenured faculty members. The college's unclassified salary budget was $1,695,261 with $868,950 tied up in tenured teachers salaries.

— The College of Arts and Sciences had 362.5 tenurable teaching positions and only 287.1 faculty members with tenure. The college's total unclassified salary budget was $12,657,787 and $8,444,626 was tied up in tenured faculty salaries.

— The College of Business Administration had 27.7 tenurable teaching positions and only 13.7 faculty hold tenure. The college's total unclassified salary budget was $1,615,024 with $520,247 going to tenured faculty salaries.

— The College of Education had 65.7 tenurable teaching positions and only 48.9 faculty members with tenure. Education's total unclassified salary budget was $2,141,466 with $1,374,867 tied up in tenured salaries.

— The College of Engineering had 85.2 tenurable teaching positions with 67.5 faculty holding tenure. The college's total unclassified salary budget was $3,429,213 with $2,469,766 tied up in tenured salaries.

— The College of Home Economics had 49.6 tenurable faculty positions and only 29 tenured faculty members. The college's total unclassified salary budget was $1,621,837 with $880,738 going to tenured faculty members.

— The College of Veterinary Medicine had 35.4 tenured positions available and 23.8 were filled. The college's total unclassified salary budget was $1,667,389 with $1,009,983 of that tied up in tenured faculty salaries.

Ben Mahaffey, associate professor of forestry, has been recommended for dismissal and suspended from University duties. He is the first tenured professor since the University adopted AAUP tenure guidelines in 1947, and possibly the first in University history, to be fired. He was fired for professional incompetence.

Because the firing is the first, specific guidelines did not exist for the Faculty Senate hearing that is mandatory for such action. Once the guidelines were established, six tenured faculty members, who do not hold administrative positions and are not involved with the College of Agriculture (Department of Forestry is in the agriculture college), were chosen as members of the committee to hear the case.

The case is tentatively scheduled to begin the week of Jan. 16-20 with the pre-hearing at 2:30 p.m., Jan. 17 in Union Room 209. The case and pre-hearing are open to the public with limited seating.

At the pre-hearing, both sides will exchange lists of witnesses and exhibits to be used in the hearing and decide what are the trial issues.

Soviets suspend talks on arms negotiations

By The Associated Press

GENEVA, Switzerland — The Soviet Union recessed its nuclear strategic-arms talks with the United States on Thursday without setting a date for resumption.

U.S. officials predicted the Soviets would return to the bargaining table. But Moscow's move threatened to leave the superpowers with no major forum for negotiating cutbacks in nuclear missiles.

In Washington, President Reagan, while sounding optimistic about an eventual resumption of the talks, signaled that he may be ready for a summit meeting with Soviet leader Yuri V. Andropov.

The Soviets, in announcing suspension of the negotiations, said deployment of new U.S. medium-range missiles in Europe had created a "change in the overall strategic situation," forcing it to re-examine the issues in START — the strategic arms reduction talks.

On Nov. 23, after the arrival of the American cruise and Pershing 2 missiles in Western Europe, the Soviets broke off the medium-range "Euromissile" talks, which had been carried on here parallel to the START discussions on long-range missiles and bombers.

Thursday's meeting had been scheduled as the final one of the current round, beginning a holiday recess. Ordinarily the sides would have set a resumption date for approximately eight weeks from now.

But Soviet Ambassador Viktor P. Karpov read a statement to chief U.S. negotiator Edward L. Rowny, saying the talks stalled because of the new missiles and the Soviets would not agree to a new date.

"A change in the overall strategic situation due to the beginning of the deployment of new American missiles in Europe compels the Soviet side to re-examine all the issues, which are the subject of the discussion at the talks on the limitation and reduction of strategic armaments," the Soviet news agency

Tass said later in summarizing the Soviet argument.

Earlier this week, Soviet officials in Moscow warned that the strategic arms talks were headed in the same direction as the medium-range negotiations, which Kremlin leaders have written off as a "dead letter."

Rowny told reporters the United States regretted the Soviet decision and "cannot agree with Soviet assertions that developments outside the scope of these negotiations require the Soviet Union to withhold agreement on a resumption date for the sixth round of START."

The school of life

I wish I had something philosophical to say about my stay here at K-State. Somehow I feel this column should be filled with something that could be found on my tombstone. But then why should this column be any different than any other I've written?

I've tried to stay out of school politics, leaving it to more informed columnists. I felt the scope of the world is much broader than K-State. Like many older students, K-State is (or was) only a minute part of my life. My main concern was putting food on the table for my son and staying one step in front of the bad check I wrote yesterday.

I'm more concerned about making the world I'm going to a better place than what's going on here. My stay at K-State was a relatively short one, compared to the time I'll spend in the "real world."

Changing the archaic ideas of men about women are important to me. In my view, finding a better way than the Equal Rights Amendment to create equality for women is more important than who's going to get to live in the Smith House.

The ignorant ideas of committees in the state or national legislatures are more important and will affect myself and my family much longer than anything Student Senate decides to do or not to do.

I have little time to concern myself with greek affairs when our national foreign affairs are in such turmoil.

I haven't written as much as I would have liked to. Life got in my way. I have strong opinions about abortions, the death penalty, diversion, mercy killings and many other controversial issues. I didn't write about them because I didn't have the time to research them properly. But they should be written about, talked about and thought about.

I've tried to look on the brighter side of life, too. I've tried to laugh at myself and at life. Disregarding what I've learned about my field of study, I think it's the small things about K-State that I will remember and probably miss the most.

There are only two things that made 8:30 a.m. classes worth going to — coffee and the carillon. There was just something about walking to school early in the morning after having a pot of hot black coffee when the sun was shining and the squirrels (the four-legged kind) were busy playing and listening to the lovely sound of the carillon that made the entire day good.

The beautiful sound that instrument makes is matched only by the pipe organ in All Faiths Chapel.

Of course the windy, rainy, cold, crummy mornings when nobody but fools walked to school were a different story.

I think summer school was my favorite time of the school year. You could find a place to sit down in the Union and didn't have to stand in line during registration, to use the ladies room or to check out a book at the library. Lines and K-State are synonymous.

With each season the look of K-State changes. The people who take care of the grounds do a great job. It may be a little expensive but, what the heck, it's only money.

The many friends I've made at K-State will slip into the old memory from time to time. I wonder what they'll be doing in 30 years? For that matter, I wonder what I'll be doing in 30 years.

I guess that's what it all boils down to. You work for over four years (yes, I confess I too am a fifth-year senior) to get a degree, and then what do you do with it? You hang it on the wall to collect dust.

A lot of what you learn in college you can't find in books, but in life. The real key to education is not what you know, but how you apply it to life.

That kind of knowledge can't be found in books. You have to learn it the hard way — by going through another school they call life. I've just been through pre-school and I have a long way to go.

Farewell and amen.

According to the latest decision, this will be the last column I'll write for the Collegian — at least, at this time. Maybe come another year, another editor will want the kind of material I write.

In that this is my last column, it seems appropriate to me to share with the readers several observations. I would never call these "final observations." I doubt that I'll ever be finished making statements (and writing them down) until after I'm dead.

When Paul Hanson called me on the telephone last August and asked me to write this column, I was delighted — although I wasn't sure I could come up with a column three times a week, as he wished. That was something I had never done before.

It's clear that my hesitation had no basis in fact. I know now that I'm a terrible blabbermouth, that I love to tell stories, and that writing comes very easily to me. There's no question in my mind but that I could write a column of this nature daily — if I had the outlet.

Is there anybody out there who wants to pick up a columnist on a regular basis?

Writing this column this semester naturally has caused me to remember other columns I've written.

Most recent one to this was one called "One Man's Frontier," which appeared in the Flint Hills Journal during 1979 and 1980. When that magazine folded, the concept of that column was transferred to a regular radio program called "One Man's Journey," which is broadcast over KSAC at the end of the New York Philharmonic concert on Monday afternoons. I've now had that radio program for more than four years. Tune in some time. It might amuse you.

It had been more than 25 years before the column in Flint Hills Journal that I had ever written such a thing. In the early 1950s, I had a weekly column in a magazine published in Los Angeles. I called that column "The Boiling Pot." No, it had nothing to do with the preparation of marijuana. That was back in the days when the word "pot" still meant a tin kettle. I remember that I had a beard then. There was this line drawing of my bearded face which was at the head of each column. I titled the column as I did because I fancied myself in those days as being politically wise — and I was interested in "stirring things up." You know how young people are.

On two occasions, once in 1941 and 1942 then again in 1946, I wrote a column called "Man About Town" for a magazine published in Pennsylvania. Have you ever noticed how sometimes young people — just out of their teens, usually — often fancy themselves as being very sophisticated and wise in the way of the world? That's why I called the column what I did. I really thought I knew a great deal about everything in those days. Later, of course, I came to realize I was a whole lot dumber than could ever be measured.

And then of course there was the first column I ever wrote, one called "In the Halls of PHS," a column of high-school news which I wrote in 1939 — and which I described how I got to write in one of my earliest columns this semester.

Well, so much for columns I've written before this one. Sometimes it's pleasant to reminisce.

Carried away with me, separate from anything else from writing this column this semester, are the many responses I've received. There is no way I could thank everyone who has told me they've enjoyed this or that column. (I only wish that everyone who did that had also written a letter to the Collegian to that effect! I think it would have made an impressive pile.)

There was the hostess in Cotton's Plantation who commented about my having written 53 pages for Mr.

Fagan when I was a junior in high school. Early in the semester, there was the hostess at Gregov's who liked the columns on baseball. Bill Felber of The Manhattan Mercury also commented about those columns. I know that Don Marks at the high school was one of my constant readers. So was Tony Woods at the Union National Bank. It came to my attention that certain sections of the class in English Composition had used some of the columns as examples of certain types of writing. Students in Oral Communication turned in copies of the column as part of class assignments. On several occasions total strangers stopped me on campus to tell me they had liked some story I had told or something I had said.

Perhaps most gratifying response of all to me is the fact that Earl Loganbill, editor of the Solomon Valley Post, which is published in Beloit, asked to reprint my column on "Mass Suicide."

The list goes on and on. As I said, I can't begin to thank everyone.

What can I say in conclusion? The use of words, particularly in terms of definitions, has always been of great interest to me.

Consider, for example, the word "present." It means to be in this place, in this space. It means now, as opposed to then. Pronounced slightly differently, it means to give — or, closely akin to that meaning, something which is given.

Be here now — giving. All that is contained in the word "present."

Just think — if we all did that, there wouldn't be any more personal or international conflict.

That's a pretty good concluding concept — don't you think?

Let's not forget the words "farewell" and "amen." After all, I titled this column that way.

The word "farewell" is clear in meaning. It means to fare well, to have a good day, and all that jazz. The word "amen" isn't quite as well understood. According to the dictionary, it means "so it is" or "so be it." In a sense, it could be claimed that when Walter Cronkite used to say, "That's the way it is!" at the end of his news programs he was really saying, "Amen."

Farewell, good people. Let's learn to live in peace with each other.

This is my last column — for now. So be it. Amen.

Confessions of an ex-columnist

I plead the First Amendment.

When I applied for the position of "columnist" last May, I really didn't know what I was in for.

I did know, however, that I was sick and tired of reading about "food in the Union," or "my favorite recipe" and some of the other columns that had no place on an editorial page. Personal experiences belong on an entertainment page (sorry, Joel). But among the issues I wrote on, note; I never slammed motherhood, baseball or apple pie.

And now after seven months, 27 columns, and 540 column inches, I'll write my first "personal experience" column. But still, "don't write because you want to say something — write because there's something to be said."

If anyone thinks this column-bit has been bunches of fun, I'd love the opportunity to laugh in your face.

Just take one fairly low-key student, a fairly "nice" person who was studying journalism and public relations (of all things), a stranger to public opinion, and have her practice First Amendment rights...and see what happens.

I stand on the First Amendment and my right to freedom of speech and freedom of the press. I retract nothing. If I have stepped on your toes, you have another foot. If I made you mad, good; maybe it's the first time you've thought all year.

But the First Amendment is not only for the press, it's for the public and everyone that has ever shared their views and opinions.

First, let's localize the First Amendment.

"Congress, (or administration, Student Senate, the greek system, the public) shall make no law (or restrictions) ...abridging the freedom of speech (or editorials) or of the (student) press (the Collegian); or the right of the (students) people peaceably to assemble (ANYWHERE, not only at the unconstitutional "designated free speech areas" on campus), and to petition the government (Student Governing Association) for a redress of grievances."

You see, I happen to believe that an editorial page should be treated as one. It makes no difference to me that this is Manhattan, Kan., — "home of the conservative campus." My theory is that it is my opinion, no better than that of any other of the 18,449 K-State students. The fact is, I was appointed one of the columnists and had the privilege to have my opinions in print.

But with the printed word, there is the public scrutiny.

I noticed that some people actually recognized me from that blasted mug shot. The same mug that I had fought (and lost) to have left OUT of the paper, was soon to be clipped and made into "ban Edee" buttons (compliments of some student senators).

My first taste of reactions was from the column, "Ah, come on Kansas." Ah, come on Edee, they said, and totally convinced me that there ARE deer and antelope frolicking in everyone's backyard but mine.

"Watching the Smith Circus," made me hesitate when calling our University president "Smooth Talker Acker" throughout. But I realize that he is, so I did. But that wasn't the last he heard from me. Nevertheless, I respect the administrators most for the fact that they never tried to interfere with the freedom of our student press.

And ah yes, my fondest memory: Student Senate. They occupied only seven columns — still that wasn't enough. Come on, government officals get more treatment from "the" press than our little student government does from the Collegian.

Now the column on the Thunderbirds really took off (pardon the pun) in "The Student Senate Military." That night seven senators dressed in fatigues for the senate meeting. That was the day I learned to accept jeers across campus and yells across parking lots. Shortly after, I also learned to deal with drinking students who wanted to give me their views...when I just wanted to be a student out with my friends. Being called names for what I wrote made me appreciate again our freedom of speech...and accept theirs.

But it certainly didn't stop there. "The neighborhood bar," followed and "fans" came out of the woodwork. More greeks discovered where the newsroom is than I care to remember.

Now that was the day that the secretary took the message from a male caller that, my "life is in jeopardy...(click)."

With thoughts of all the fruitloops out there, it began to make me think. It also made me furious that anyone would have threatened my life,

Homes need to be secure

The holiday season is upon us and as the adage says, 'tis the season to be jolly. However, 'tis also the season to be cautious. Holiday gifts make alluring targets for burglars. This letter is to urge all individuals to take extra measures to secure their homes, so that this holiday season will remain a safe and happy one.

There are several areas to consider when safe-guarding your home against potential intruders. Doors leading outside are one area to check when securing your home. In addition to the lock already in the handle of the door, a deadbolt lock or similar lock should be installed on the door as an added safeguard. Windows are another area to check. Windows should be inspected to ensure they have a workable lock. If they don't, boards may be placed between the window and the frame to prevent entry from the outside. Storm windows also add an extra measure of security.

A final area to consider when securing your home is lighting. All doors leading outside should have an exterior light above them, which is turned on as soon as it gets dark. And whenever you go out at night, leave a light on in the house so that it appears that someone is home.

Although none of these measures can guarantee that your home will never be burglarized, they will lessen your chances of having to deal with an unwanted intruder.

Barbarism Khomeini style

We Americans are privileged to live in a free country. We encourage foreigners to live, study and work in this country as guests, subject to our laws and guaranteed full rights under our constitution. Many of these foreign guests come from countries which are covertly or openly hostile to the people and policies of the United States. They have freedoms here which would not be granted in their native land to themselves or foreign nationals. It would seem that some of these people abuse their freedoms here and laugh in our faces. The current controversy concerning the gathering of pro-Khomeini Iranian "students" prompts me to share an insight into the attitudes of the current "government" in Iran, and its supporters.

An article in "Linn's Stamp News," dated Nov. 21, 1983, describes a set of stamps issued by the Iranian government.

"The new stamps, issued Nov. 3, the fourth anniversary of the seizure of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran, show the burning of the U.S. flag, blindfolded U.S. diplomats and the "students" climbing the embassy wall..."

A nation's stamps generally depict people, places, things and events that a nation is proud of. Stamps are seen as great public relations tools, as demonstrated by the current U.S. Olympics stamps. Unfortunately, other countries see them as propaganda instruments. It is evident that the Iranian government is proud of its criminal act of four years ago.

As an American, I am disgusted with and offended by those Iranian "students" who tell us that Islam (Khomeini style) is a light to the world. In order to respect the rights that I, as well as they, have in this country, all I can do is exercise my freedom of speech in asking them:

If you think America is so evil and Iran is so wonderful, why don't you go home?

Invention of games yields fun, profit

By KELLY CARLSON
Collegian Reporter

The creator of Jonathan Bradford, a cartoon strip carried by the Collegian last spring, is at it again. But this time Jonathan's creator, Mark Shaw, has another brainchild — Shaw's Games.

Shaw, a Manhattan resident and a 1978 K-State graduate, has been creating games since he was 3 years old and said he has enjoyed it ever since.

"I intended to go to law school, but I kept thinking more and more about producing games, so I thought that I would give it a try," he said. "And if it didn't work out, then I would go to law school."

Shaw's first commercial game, "Candidate," was a board game produced in 1980. Concerning politics, "Candidate" was similar to the game Monopoly, he said. The game, which was available in most major cities, sold well for the first few years, but sales later declined.

His most recent invention is "Deca-Duck," a card game that was introduced in October. Deca-Duck is similar to Uno and Pit. The game's object is to discard two cards that total 10.

When a player holds the last two cards that equal 10, he shouts

Graduate wins with business

"Deca!" After hearing this, the remaining players throw the rest of their cards on the table and shout "Duck!" The last player to do this is the "duck." Ten points are deducted from the duck's score and are added to the score of the person who shouted "Deca!" The other players lose one point for each card that is left in their hand.

Since the creation of "Deca-Duck," Shaw has remained busy promoting his product through samples and telephone sales. He operates Shaw's Games out of his Manhattan home.

Shaw's answering service enables him to make business contacts while he promotes his games.

"I have an answering service because a lot of the time I am away trying to sell my games. Also, when you are dealing with big companies, they like to feel that they are dealing with a real firm rather than an individual," Shaw said.

"Sometimes I'll get a message to call a company back and they will tell me that they talked to my secretary. It's really funny.

Sometimes I'll get a call for the 'so-and-so' department at my firm," he said.

Shaw said that he is directing his games more toward the children's market right now, but some college students enjoy Deca-Duck as much as children, he said.

Because the game is educational and fun, many teachers have bought the game for their students, Shaw said.

"I also received a letter from a lady who bought the game for her second-grader, who really liked it," he said. "She (the woman) also had a little girl who was in kindergarten who always wanted to play the game, but they wouldn't let her because she couldn't count to 10. So the little girl sat and watched them play and figured out all the different number combinations for 10."

About 1,000 Deca-Duck games have been sold and Shaw said he expects the number to increase after the holidays.

"Deca-Duck came out a little late in the season," he said. "By the time

I got to the stores (to promote the game), most of them already had their entire stock for Christmas," he said.

"But I did get some pretty good responses from the stores," he added. "The ones that didn't buy at Christmas said to come back in the spring because that is when they try out new things."

He also attends trade shows to introduce his games.

Shaw plans to produce more games if Deca-Duck generates the amount of money he anticipates. He said he has a good back-log of games ready.

"The games are very expensive to produce. There's the plates, the developing expenses and sale promotions. A person has to have a lot of cash up front to do it," he said.

Shaw developed a corporation to finance his games.

Developing and perfecting a game require time, he said. To perfect them, Shaw has college students sample the games.

"I get people from different backgrounds so they can tell me their likes and dislikes about the game," he said. "I really feel sorry for the people that have to try the game out for its first time because of all the bumps. But over time, it keeps getting better and better."

Doctor attempts to halt woman's starvation

By The Associated Press

RIVERSIDE, Calif. — A psychiatrist reaffirmed his vow Thursday to force-feed a cerebral palsy victim rather than let her starve herself to death, even if it meant he was breaking a law.

Dr. Donald E. Fisher, chief of psychiatry at Riverside General Hospital, where Elizabeth Bouvia is being treated, said he was convinced the 26-year-old woman eventually will change her mind.

"I think intervening things would happen," he said. "She would have a change in attitude and motivation."

However, he also said he did not know how long he would continue to wait for her to have a change of heart.

"What will you do if after one month, she has not changed her mind?" asked Richard Scott, an American Civil Liberties Union attorney representing Bouvia.

"I will tell you when that time comes," Fisher said.

Asked by Scott whether force-feeding would increase Elizabeth Bouvia's hope for the future, he said, "it would keep her alive."

"Would it increase her autonomy?" asked Scott.

"It would," Fisher said. "If she dies, she would have no autonomy."

Bouvia, a quadriplegic with virtually no motor functions, has said she no longer wants to live a life of dependency on others, a life which promises her only further pain, and wants to be allowed to starve herself to death.

The hearing under way before Riverside Superior Court Judge John H. Hews will determine whether a preliminary injunction can bar Riverside County and hospital officials from force-feeding her or giving her medical aid.

The American Civil Liberties Union, represented by Scott, is defending Bouvia's right to refuse treatment at the hospital.

The county says she is merely seeking official assistance in committing suicide, which is illegal.

In his fourth day on the witness stand, Fisher said he was aware that he would be violating various laws if he inserted a feeding tube in a patient who had not given her consent.

"Do you know that inserting a tube can be construed as battering?" asked Scott.

"I know that," said Fisher. "I also know that pushing a patient away from a car that's about to hit them can also be construed as battering."

Scott then asked whether Fisher believed he would be violating Bouvia's civil rights under federal codes if he force-fed her.

"I'm not aware of the civil codes," the doctor said. "But I am willing to accept that responsibility."

Protests may freeze nuclear arms

MADISON, Wis. — Gov. Anthony S. Earl says civil disobedience and mass demonstrations may well be required for the nuclear weapons freeze movement to succeed in influencing government policy.

Earl delivered a guest lecture Wednesday at the University of Wisconsin in a course called "Perspectives on Nuclear War," and one student asked him about an apparent failure of the democratic process to influence policy on arms reductions.

"It apparently is going to take something more than we have done to date," Earl replied, "and perhaps it's going to have to take on the dimensions of what did happen in civil rights in the 1960s, and what did happen in the Vietnam War. What's happened to date does not seem to have galvanized enough support from those we elect."

Earl said "mass demonstrations of the kind we're seeing in Europe and perhaps even a carefully thought-out campaign of civil disobedience — these have been models of political action which carried the great moral issues of the 20th century and can work again."

But he told reporters later that he was not advising students to take to the streets "and start raising hell."

Legendary pharmacy up for sale

HOLLYWOOD — Schwab's Pharmacy, the Sunset Boulevard landmark where movie star Lana Turner was supposedly discovered, is closed and up for sale — bringing tears to at least one movie star.

The store's fixtures went on sale Wednesday and owner Leon Schwab said he was closing the store and coffee shop for family reasons.

The pharmacy has had a loyal Hollywood following even though the story about Turner has never been proved.

Schwab said friends and celebrities called him with "condolences."

Actress Barbara Stanwyck called in tears, he said.

"She's been a customer here for almost 40 years and she called me up when I closed the store," Schwab said. "She was crying and that to me is a great tribute."

Chinese names in the 'Wei'

PEKING — There is "Big Li Wei," "No. 2 Li Wei," "Big Eyes Li Wei" and "Long Braids Li Wei."

The nicknames are necessary at one company in northeast China's Shenyang City because it has more than 10 people all named Li Wei, the Canton newspaper Yangcheng Evening News reports.

China has only a few hundred family names for its one billion people. In addition, certain given names have become quite popular. "Wei," for example, means "great." "Shuzhen" means "precious and fair."

A Shenyang policeman has suggested that parents avoid one-character given names like Wei in naming their children, said the paper's Wednesday edition, seen in Peking on Thursday.

"We intentionally tied it in with the Christmas season hoping that people would extend their Christmas spirit to include some of our city facilities," said James Overbeek, assistant city manager for community enrichment.

Rec center seeks funds for costly fence repair

By JOAN SEITZER
Collegian Reporter

Fences surrounding the outdoor tennis courts at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Complex are still in need of repair a year and a half after being damaged by a windstorm.

On June 7, 1982, a wind storm with over 70 mph winds swept through Manhattan, causing thousands of dollars damage throughout campus. The fences surrounding the rec complex were one of the hardest hit areas and now require $15,000 to $16,000 to repair, said Raydon Robel, director of recreational services.

Windscreens were on the fences at the time of the storm, Robel said. But the windscreens were designed to accommodate the usual south to southwesterly winds, not the north to northwesterly winds in this storm, and as a result could not tear away from the fence as necessary.

"Thus, with no ability to tear away, they (the windscreens) just blew up against the fence. There was no give in the windscreens other than to take the fence down with it," Robel said.

In fact, he said, "these fences were never specified to hold a windscreens."

After the storm a forklift was used to straighten the fence as a temporary measure, he said. Broken posts were also taken away.

A net tennis divider has been put up as a temporary measure where the posts were destroyed, he said. This can disrupt a tennis game, he said, because in places the netting is a different color than the fence. There are also voids in the netting compared to regular fencing, he said.

Because this fence bent once, Robel said, it will bend again.

Recreational Services and the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics are trying to obtain money from University Facilities rather than using rec services or athletic funds for the repairs.

The tennis courts are classified as a University facility because the rec complex is used by such groups as University for Man, Continuing Education and physical education groups, Robel said. It shouldn't be the responsibility of the rec complex to repair the damage done to a University facility, he said.

"I hope it is repaired sooner (rather) than later because the damage isn't good public relations for the rec complex," he said.

Nuclear war survivors would face 'long winter'

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A computer-assisted Soviet study, virtually matching assessments by U.S. scientists, shows that any survivors of a nuclear war would face a "long nuclear winter" threatening their extinction, a Soviet scientist said Thursday.

"A nuclear war of any scope would mean either the disappearance of mankind or its degradation to a level below the prehistoric one," said Vladimir V. Alexandrov, head of a climate-modeling laboratory at the Soviet Academy of Sciences Computing Center.

The research findings presented by Alexandrov at a Capitol Hill symposium paralleled recent forecasts by U.S. scientists about worldwide catastrophic weather changes likely to result from a large-scale nuclear exchange.

In opening the session, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., contended that "The evidence now points overwhelmingly to this stark truth: a third world war would be the last world war — for it would be a war against the world itself."

"The inescapable truth is that the firing of even a fraction of the Soviet and American arsenals would turn the northern hemisphere into a cold desert and the whole earth into a dying planet," he said.

Kennedy and Sen. Mark O. Hatfield, R-Ore., leading congressional advocates of a U.S.-Soviet nuclear weapons freeze, co-sponsored Thursday's session in conjunction with the Nuclear Freeze Foundation, a Washington-based group.

Kennedy assailed a recent study by the Federal Emergency Management Administration suggesting that U.S. agricultural output would largely be able to survive a nuclear attack.

"I am disturbed ... by continuing signs that some in the administration regard nuclear war as winnable and survivable," he said. "This kind of thinking makes nuclear war more likely because it makes nuclear war seem more bearable."

Legislation to raise Congress' pay

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Members of Congress will get an automatic $2,400 pay raise in January thanks to some subtle legislative maneuvering during the past eight years.

Senators and members of the House always are reluctant to handle directly the issue of their salary, which is now $69,800 a year. The 3.5 percent increase due next month will go into effect without legislators having lifted a finger this year.

The raise results in part from a provision added to minor legislation in 1975. The House on a voice vote passed the bill authorizing an occupational and health program for the postal service, and sent it to the Senate.

The Senate committee with jurisdiction over the bill then met behind closed doors and attached an amendment to the legislation that had the effect of including members of Congress among the group of federal white collar workers who automatically get pay increases upon the recommendation of the president.

The Senate adopted the amended bill 58-29 and sent it back to the House, which agreed to the legislation on a 214-213 vote.

Then Rep. Larry Pressler, R-S.D., now a senator, filed suit to block the legislation, saying it violated the provision of the Constitution that says "the senators and representatives shall receive compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law..."

Pressler said the Constitution's framers expected Congress would set a precise amount of congressional salary, which the legislation did not do, "with the ultimate result that no one is accountable to the voting public for the increases." He lost the suit.

However, the rules still required a separate vote for the annual appropriation for additional money for congress' salary increases.

In 1977, 1978, 1980 and 1981, Congress voted against appropriating additional money for a pay raise.

In 1981, however, Congress removed the necessity for a separate vote on appropriating money for legislators' salaries. Language was inserted in a bill that year saying "the provisions herein for the various items of official expenses of members, officers and committees of the Senate and House, and clerk hire for senators and members shall be the permanent law with respect thereto."

The bill died. Nonetheless, that language was simply referred to, not included, in a separate stopgap spending bill that was enacted.

The effect was that members of the House and Senate no longer have to vote every year to provide the money for their salaries because the money automatically is there under "permanent law" — regardless of how much Congress decides to pay itself.

Meanwhile, the earlier legislation provision was in place applying scheduled pay raises for white collar government workers to members of the House and Senate so long as Congress does nothing to exempt itself from the increases.

Congress did nothing to block the next increase before it adjourned for the year Nov. 18, thus members automatically will receive the 3.5 percent January pay boost.

Carlin backs 'superfund' for waste cleanup

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A permanent ban on land burial of hazardous waste, and the creation of a state "superfund" to finance the clean-up of some 200 existing Kansas hazardous waste sites, will be unveiled by Gov. John Carlin today.

The Associated Press has learned that the Democratic governor plans to team the environmental protection program with his still-undisclosed proposals on education and make them the pillars of his 1984 legislative program.

Sources close to the governor's office, who spoke only on the agreement they not be identified, told the AP that Carlin ranks the environmental protection plan second only to educational issues in statewide importance. And Carlin is expected to stress that point when he unveils his budget to lawmakers in early January.

One source said the plan basically means "an end to Furley as we now know it" — referring to the closed hazardous waste dump in Sedgwick County. The source said Carlin's plan would prevent the Furley dump from reopening and expanding under an application submitted to the state in September. Instead, alternate disposal methods would have to be developed.

Michael Swenson, the governor's spokesman, said Thursday that Carlin has been working with state health officials since the summer "pursuing a number of initiatives in the area of the environment."

"There are a few details left undecided," Swenson said. "The governor will meet with Secretary (Barbara) Sabol Friday morning to hammer out the final details in hopes of finalizing a plan that can be discussed at the news conference this afternoon."

Carlin reportedly thinks that a total ban on burial of hazardous waste as of July 1, 1984 is the only way to prevent a re-occurrence of the kind of groundwater and surface water contamination that marred the Furley hazardous waste dump.

Creation of the so-called superfund would be coupled with the development of a possibly 10-member taskforce within the Department of Health and Environment. The waste squad would make detailed studies of the more than 200 uncontrolled waste sites in Kansas at a cost of $500,000 in 1984.

Eventually, the size of the superfund would expand into a $5 million pool of money, probably fed by fees levied on generators of hazardous waste, sources said.

The existing emergency water pollution control fund would be turned into the superfund, under Carlin's plan, and be used to finance cleanup of the waste sites once they have been studies and prioritized by the taskforce.

The 80-acre Furley dump, located about 10 miles northeast of Wichita, was closed by Carlin in January 1982 after state health inspectors found acids and chemical wastes leaking into nearby Prairie Creek and underground waterways.

Substances ranging from acids, paint sludge and heavy metal sludges to organic chemicals such as pesticides and agricultural chemicals were buried at the dump. The waste dump operators were fined by the Environmental Protection Agency for mishandling wastes before the state shut down operations there.

Only chemical wastes are buried at Furley and the ban would cover chemical byproducts and wastes rather than nuclear wastes, such as those generated by nuclear generating plants, which must be stored on the site where they are produced.

The federal government controls the storage of nuclear waste — called high level radioactive waste. There is already a ban on the disposal of low level radioactive waste in Kansas until an interstate compact begins governing the disposal of low level waste in Kansas and several neighboring states.

Just two months ago, health officials discovered dioxin — a deadly chemical byproduct of herbicide manufacturing — in water samples taken from a test well at the dump site. The dioxin was found in oily liquids taken from the well.

Waste Management Inc., of Oak Brook, Ill., owner of the facility, has begun clean-up operations at Furley and has asked the health and environment department for permission to reopen and expand operations at the site.

Under a plan submitted to the state health agency in September, the dump, which is operated by National Industrial Environmental Services, a subsidiary of Waste Management, would be reopened and waste treatment and burial expanded onto an adjoining 80 acres of land.

However, area residents and officials, including U.S. Rep. Dan Glickman, have complained that the site should be closed. Glickman, who represents the Wichita area, sent a letter to Carlin saying the waste dump should never be allowed to reopen now that dioxin has been found in test wells.

Health officials have known for some time that materials containing dioxin were buried in chemical disposal pits at the Furley dump. But tests of the groundwater wells never before detected leakage of the toxic substance.

The disposal alternatives to ground burial are incineration and recycling of wastes, or development of above-ground storage in mausoleum-type buildings.

Recycling would dispose of about 50 percent of the hazardous waste generated in Kansas. Incineration would also dispose of a large portion but both methods are very expensive.

One source who was briefed on the proposal represents a special interest group interested in environmental topics. The source said the total ban might not be the best idea because some hazardous wastes simply cannot be recycled or incinerated.

The source complimented Carlin on his timing, though, noting that land burial could be banned without much protest because, with Furley closed, there is currently no place to dispose of the wastes.

Pro, anti-Khomeini students debate conference's purpose

By KARRA PORTER
Collegian Reporter

There may be up to 1,000 Iranians in Manhattan at the end of December, despite the efforts of one group to prevent it.

A national conference, sponsored by an organization known as the Persian-Speaking Group, is scheduled to be held in Manhattan from Dec. 26-28. The purpose of the conference has created some controversy here.

A local pro-Khomeini Iranian student, who declined to be identified because of possible repercussions, has attended several similar conferences. He said they are only for the teaching of Islam, not for any political purpose.

"This conference has been (going on) for eight or nine years, even before the revolution that happened in Iran," he said, denying claims that the conference is a political forum for Khomeini supporters.

Moslem supporters from across the nation are invited to lecture on "Islamic laws and Islamic rules," he said.

The local anti-Khomeini Iranian Student Association denied this purpose. The group's representative, who also declined to be identified, said the conference is a chance for pro-Khomeini students to plan the future of Iran after Khomeini's death.

"There is a strong anti-Khomeini movement, and they will also be discussing how to deal with these anti-Khomeini people," he said, then smiled. "They are formulating their members, rank and file — 'brainwashing' them, really."

Last Friday the ISA placed an advertisement in the Collegian expressing its concerns about the conference. In the opening paragraph, it referred to those attending the conference as "fanatical supporters of Khomeini...better known as a group of agents of Khomeini's barbaric regime."

The ad antagonized the pro-Khomeini Moslem Iranian Student Organization.

"What is in that article (advertisement) is a lie," the pro-Khomeini student said. "They say we are sponsoring the conference, but we are not," he said excitedly. "We don't know anything about it."

Although the MISO was not named in the advertisement, the MISO representative said it was clear the ISA was referring to his organization.

The ISA didn't deny it. "They use different names," said the anti-Khomeini student, who is also a member of ISA. "Moslem Iranian Student Organization, Iranian Moslem Students, Persian-Speaking Group. The members are the same but, depending on the occasion, they use a different name."

He also refuted the pro-Khomeini version of the purpose of the conference.

"We have ways of finding out," he said. "There are less-loyal people."

"If that (conspiring) is not what they're doing, we challenge them to make it open," the anti-Khomeini representative said.

The pro-Khomeinis responded by asserting that the conference is open to all Moslem Iranians, regardless of political affiliation. Anyone who can benefit from the lectures is welcome, the pro-Khomeini representative said.

He also discounted what the anti-Khomeini students say is their biggest fear — the threat of violence. Members of the ISA say they are concerned with the safety of their homes, citing a similar conference in Lawrence a few years ago at which "people got stabbed."

The pro-Khomeinis, however, said the protests are only "propaganda." "There is no threat against anyone," their representative said. "They are working for the propaganda machine against the Islamic Republic."

The representatives of MISO also said they believe the anti-Khomeini group and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are collaborating against their organization.

"They (the anti-Khomeini group) are merely being supported by foreign elements, like the FBI or the CIA," the MISO source said. "They were making lots of trouble in Iran."

The anti-Khomeinis have a similar complaint, but against the Kansas Bureau of Investigation. Members of the association accused the KBI of "sacrificing the rights of innocent people" (anti-Khomeinis) to carry out an investigation of the pro-Khomeini forces.

The anti-Khomeinis also accused the operators of the Ramada Inn of sacrificing their rights for profit. The Ramada is renting most of its rooms to the conference members during the three days of the conference.

Early last week the Persian-

Speaking Group had also reserved the Manhattan High School for meetings and meals and Pottorf Hall in CiCo Park for meal preparation, but those reservations were canceled.

The contract for Pottorf Hall was canceled because of the timing, not because of the political situation, said Jim Lindquist, director of the Riley County extension office. The extension office is responsible for leasing the county-owned buildings in CiCo Park and having a person on the grounds, which is why the problem arose, Lindquist said.

"They were making tentative arrangements to rent it (from) the Dec. 26 through Dec. 28, but basically for around-the-clock use so they could prepare meals," he said.

"We decided we really couldn't let the facility out outside of the normal operating hours, which are from 8 a.m. to 10 p.m., and also Dec. 26 is a county holiday. We were going to have to try to find somebody that could come in and make the facility available on that holiday."

Lindquist said the decision was unrelated to the nature of the conference. He said he told the representative from the Persian-Speaking Group they could still use the facility within the operating hours on Dec. 27 and 28. He said the representative did not contact him about the offer.

James Benjamin, Manhattan superintendent of schools, canceled an agreement allowing use of Manhattan High School to the group because of the apparent risk to school property.

"We just don't rent a facility for a political purpose," he said. "We didn't want anything happening in our building or on the premises that was outside the regular decorum of meetings that we have."

Benjamin said he had already begun to reconsider the contract before he was aware of the conflict. The group was asking for more and more space, he said, and they were even asking to sleep in the gymnasium. The increasing size and requests of the group led to his decision to cancel the agreement, he said.

"I had gotten the impression that some kind of disturbance might occur," he said. "I don't care what their politics are or their political affiliation. I do care about protecting the school buildings, and the best way to do that is to say 'You can't meet here.'"

The inn is standing firm in its offer to the group. Last week, Operations Manager Dan Richards said he had been contacted by a representative from an opposing group (of anti-Khomeini students) who tried to dissuade him from renting the rooms.

The man indicated there was a risk that problems might arise, he said.

"We looked into that — the possibility of trouble," he said. "We don't expect any trouble here in the hotel."

Although Richards said he doesn't expect trouble, anti-Khomeini protesters showed up outside the hotel Saturday, as reported in the Dec. 5 Collegian. The protest did not change the Ramada's decision, Richards said.

Want To Sell Your Books ?

Question: How does the Union Bookstore determine how much your books are worth when you sell them back?

Answer: If the Bookstore has notification from the instructor that the books are to be re-adopted for use the next semester, and if the Bookstore does not already have a sufficient stock on hand, then you will be offered 60% of the publisher's current list price.

For example: If a book sells for $10 new and it meets the requirements noted above, the book would be bought from you for $6.

If the Bookstore has not received notice that the book will be used again, or if it already has a sufficient stock on hand, the book would be worth the current wholesale price as indicated by one of the nation's largest jobbers of used textbooks.

If you have any questions about the price being paid for a textbook, the buyer will be happy to answer any questions which you may have regarding the price paid.

Question: Is 60% the usual price paid for textbooks around the country?

Answer: Definitely not. Most stores in the United States pay only 50% for books being used again. The Union Bookstore is one of the few stores which pays 60%. And remember, we pay cash. You don't have to take your money out in trade.

Question: What about paperbacks? Does the 60% policy apply to them too?

Answer: Yes. The Union Bookstore does not penalize you on paperbacks. If they are being used again, and if the bookstore needs them, you will receive 60% of the publisher's list price.

Question: If the publisher's price has gone up since I bought my books, will I receive the benefit of that price increase?

Answer: Yes. For instance, if you bought your book for $9 and the publisher's list price is now $10, you will get $6, not $5.40.

New laser video disc games improve space battle realism

By JEFF ENDACOTT
Staff Writer

Hans Solo's reign as space hero is being challenged with the recent addition of laser video disc units to computer games.

Challengers can now pilot their craft against an enemy onslaught produced from a videotape. Instead of destroying a group of colored dots created by a computer, enemy ships explode into a realistic version of flame and debris on the screens of the new games. The chance to replace Solo in the cockpit is bringing customers back into the arcades.

For those who can devour everything in sight on Pac Man, or those who haven't tried computer games, video disc games represent something new. Ben Campbell manages LeMans Family Fun Center in Aggieville, which has three of the new games — Astron Belt, Dragon's Lair and Mach III.

In these games, laser technology enables an image to be projected from a video disc onto the television-like screen, Campbell said. The video disc unit is mounted inside the cabinet of the game. Controls similar to the traditional games are used and are mounted on the top of the cabinet.

"The advantage is that you get actual film footage," Campbell said. Astron Belt simulates a battle in space resembling those taking place in recent space movies. The effect of the video adds a realism the other games don't have, he said.

Fantasies also are improved on the new games. Dragon's Lair features a fully animated cartoon. The player is cast as Dirk the Daring. His mission is to rescue a fair princess from the clutches of the evil wizard. On his way, Dirk encounters an array of deadly situations. Players move Dirk with a control stick as similar characters are controlled in the original computer games. But as with Astron Belt, the video tape adds more detail to the game.

Mark Hanna, junior in accounting, discovered Dragon's Lair two weeks ago. He has been playing it occasionally since.

"It's really easier than the others," Hanna said. Dragon's Lair requires the player to memorize the sequence of traps awaiting Dirk. It's more fun because of the video, and the video provides more interesting scenarios, he said.

Sound effects add to the realism of the video disc games, especially while commanding a jet fighter when playing Mach III. Its video is enhanced by music, roaring jet engines and the voice of a co-pilot. Players sit in a compartment in front of a large screen. The roar of the jets seems to vibrate the compartment off the floor.

David Berg, senior in microbiology, slid out of the Mach III compartment with a smile on his face.

"I like them," Berg said. He said he would play more often except for the price. Video disc games cost more, about twice as much, and seem to be more difficult, he said.

Video disc games represent an investment two to three times that of conventional computer games, Campbell said. Yet, the increased cost being passed on to the public hasn't affected the number of people playing the new games. He said word-of-mouth is the only way people here have learned of the video disc games, and the number of customers playing the new games has steadily increased.

Video disc games won't resolve industry problems such as machine maintenance and a decline in video game popularity, but they are helping, Campbell said.

Reagan calls for cleanup of 'drug dens'

By The Associated Press

INDIANAPOLIS — President Reagan declared Thursday that America's schools must be "temples of learning and not drug dens," and said he ordered the Justice and Education departments to find ways of helping schools "enforce discipline."

The president, in a speech delivered before an education summit of 2,300 teachers, school administrators, politicians, parents, and teachers' union representatives, called for stricter classroom discipline and unveiled a program of presidential academic awards.

He told the group he had ordered Justice and Education "to find ways we can help teachers and administrators enforce discipline."

On the flight from Washington, White House spokesman Larry Speakes, discussing Reagan's order to the Justice Department, said the department was looking for ways in which school principals can work with law enforcement officers to improve community support for school discipline.

He said Reagan's interest in stricter discipline did not necessarily mean support for physical punishment.

Reagan rode by motorcade to the National Forum on Excellence in Education after arriving here by plane. Side streets along his motorcade route were blocked with snowplows, dumptrucks and buses, reflecting the tightened security around the president in recent weeks.

Criticizing suggestions that more money was needed to improve the nation's schools, Reagan said total money for schools was up almost 7 percent over the past year. This increase stems from greater state and local spending, rather than a greater federal contribution.

"If money alone were the answer, the problem would have been shrinking, not growing," the president said.

Speakes told reporters that while significant increases in the education budget were not anticipated, there was no decision about cutbacks. The New York Times, quoting Education Department officials, reported that the president's next education budget would be between the $15.2 billion approved by Congress this year and the $13.5 billion the administration had projected for this year.

Education Secretary T.H. Bell has acknowledged, however, that more money is needed to meet the recommendations made by a presidential commission on education last spring. That panel decried "a rising tide of mediocrity" in the nation's schools.

"America's schools don't need vast new sums of money as much as they need a few fundamental reforms," Reagan said.

"First, we need to restore good, old-fashioned discipline," he said. "In too many schools across the land, teachers can't teach because they lack the authority to make students take tests and hand in homework. Some don't even have the authority to quiet down their class."

He called for an end to "the drug and alcohol abuse that plagues hundreds of thousands of our children."

Tradition lives on with Lala's looms

By MATT MCMILLEN
Collegian Reporter

Loom weaving played an important role in America's Industrial Revolution before new inventions and greater technology brought an end to the tradition of producing goods by weaving. But for Susan Lala, Manhattan resident, the tradition lives on.

"I started weaving when I was an art student at K-State," she said. Lala, a 1968 K-State graduate, has turned a hobby into a enjoyable enterprise.

She has four large floor looms and some smaller looms on which she makes test pieces before working on the larger looms.

"Looms cost anywhere from $150 to $10,000," Lala said. "Most of the people in Manhattan who own looms have spent somewhere in the range of $400 to $900."

Lala also belongs to the Manhattan weaving guild, which began 10 years ago and now has more than 20 members.

"One woman with a large family decided to weave all of her Christmas presents," Lala said. "It took her two years, but she paid for her loom with the money that she saved.

"Costs can vary on what you make, depending on the materials that you use. Sweaters could start at $20 to $24, but they could also cost a lot more."

"One can easily put a lot of money into weaving," she said.

There are many different types of looms, ranging from an old style four-harness jack loom, the earliest loom, to a counter-balance loom, a more advanced loom. The biggest loom Lala owns is a counter-march loom, a combination of the four-harness jack and counter-balance looms.

Perhaps the most difficult part of learning to use a loom is getting the loom ready for weaving, she said.

"First you need to measure your yarn on what is called a warping board," Lala said. "Then you wind the yarn and dress the loom, which involves threading it in a series of different steps."

Lala has taught classes in loom weaving for the last six years, including two for University for Man.

"In my classes I mostly teach the students how to get started," Lala said. "The most important thing in learning (loom) is repetition."

Lala has entered contests and exhibits and has sold many pieces of her work.

"I've done things with the Strecker Gallery and been in several invitational shows. But I enjoy keeping a balance — I don't want to weave just for competition or sale, or for me and my family."

Lala makes clothing, wall hangings, rugs and other works.

She formerly owned a small weaving supply store in Riley, but she found that running the store took too much time.

"The closest major weaving store is in Lawrence, but there is a smaller store in Riley with weaving supplies," Lala said.

Lala said she enjoys many forms of art, but prefers to spend her time weaving.

"I would rather concentrate on weaving rather than spread myself too thin," Lala said. "There are so many things I'd like to weave, and I don't think I'll be able to get them all done."

Jury to check KC gambling

By The Associated Press

OMAHA, Neb. — Four men who pleaded guilty to bookmaking charges last year in Omaha appeared last month before a federal grand jury in Kansas City that is investigating a possible link between gambling operations in the two cities, according to an attorney.

The men subpoenaed to appear before the grand jury were James Y. Bonofede, 53, of Omaha; Coonie Dinovitz, 61; Donald Quinn, 55; and Patrick James O'Brien, 43, of Kansas City.

Bonofede and O'Brien were released from the federal prison camp at Leavenworth early last month after serving 366-day sentences for bookmaking during the 1981 football season in Omaha.

Quinn and Dinovitz are serving sentences of 20 months and 12 months, respectively, at the Leavenworth farm.

According to court documents in the Omaha gambling case, an FBI informant told agents that "Pat O'Brien and John Constanza were sent to Omaha, Neb., from Kansas City, Mo., to oversee the sports bookmaking operation on behalf of the Kansas City organized crime group."

K-State's Tina Dixon joins Drake Bulldog's center Lorri Bauman on the floor in an attempt to recover a loose ball as Jennifer Jones, left, and Cindy Durham, top, help out during last night's game. The Wildcats defeated the Bulldogs 68-58, and despite a sluggish game forced them into 32 turnovers.

Women hoopsters overcome errors for 68-58 victory

By VIKKI WATSON
Staff Writer

Despite what Head Coach Lynn Hickey termed a sluggish performance, the women's basketball team shook off 12 first-half turnovers and defeated the Drake University Bulldogs 68-58 last night at Ahearn Field House.

K-State, which improved its record to 5-0 with the win, took the contest's opening lead off a driving layup by sophomore Sheronda Jenkins. The Wildcats later increased that lead to five points until Drake's Kay Riek hit two straight layups to give the Bulldogs an 18-17 advantage.

And it was Riek who would give K-State first-half fits, hitting both from the outside and inside to keep Drake within striking distance. The 6-foot-1 senior connected on seven of nine field goals for 14 first-half points and ended the contest with 18. She was averaging 7.7 in her last three contests.

"Riek did a good job," Hickey said, "but we had a 5-foot-8 guard (Jenkins) on a 6-foot-1 forward. (In the second half) we went to a bigger line-up."

The 'Cats took their biggest lead of the first half at 33-26, but another Riek basket underneath plus a layup by Lorri Bauman with three seconds remaining cut the K-State lead to 33-30 at the half.

K-State highlighted play with its defense on Bauman, a pre-season all-American pick averaging 29.3 points a contest. She hit only seven of 16 shots from the field for a much-below-average showing of 14 points.

But it was offensive woes in the first half that hurt K-State, Hickey said, with the 'Cats having difficulty with Drake's zone defense.

"We were attacking their defense wrong," Hickey said, whose 'Cats ran a man-to-man offense during the first half. "They were matching up to us, but it was a zone."

Although the offense was slow to develop, junior Angie Bonner came through with a tough inside performance, hitting five of seven first-half field goals for 11 points. She finished the game with a team-high 13 points.

Bonner also led K-State with nine rebounds, second only to Drake's Wanda Ford, who finished with 10. Ford, who was the nation's top freshman rebounder last season, finished with 12 points.

K-State came up on the short end of the team rebound battle, however, grabbing 27 to Drake's 32. The Bulldogs, who started four players over 6 feet, were tough inside, Hickey said.

"They are very physical," she said.

It was this physical play in the opening moments of the second half that gave Drake a short-lived 36-35 lead off a 10-foot jumper from Ford and two straight baskets from Bauman.

The 'Cats stormed back, however, reeling off seven straight points for a 42-36 advantage.

And it was the Bulldogs who had their share of turnover problems, running into trouble with a K-State zone press.

"We got the steals off the press," Hickey said, who watched the Bulldogs commit 32 turnovers in the contest. The 'Cats still had their own share of turnover problems as well, turning the ball over 21 times.

"We weren't making anything happen," Hickey said. "We just didn't act like we were ready to play."

The play did improve, however, with K-State taking its biggest lead of the night at 58-46 off the play of guards Jenkins and sophomore Cassandra Jones, who hit four shots during the 'Cats scoring run.

Drake could get no closer than six points at the contest's end with Jenkins and sophomore Tina Dixon hitting from the outside to assure the 'Cat win.

Dixon and Jenkins followed Bonner in scoring with 12 points apiece, while sophomore Jennifer Jones added 11. Riek, Bauman and Ford led Drake with 18, 14 and 12 respectively.

The sixth-ranked 'Cats will now face Creighton University in a 2 p.m. contest Saturday and will hope to improve upon the sluggish play against Drake, Hickey said.

"It's not every night you're going to come out like a house of fire," she said. "You might just let down a bit. (But) we can't play like we did tonight because Creighton will come in after us."

Creighton is led by sophomore forward Connie Yori, who tallied 21 points and nine rebounds per game as a freshman. She currently averages 22.8 points and nine rebounds, leading the Lady Jays to a 3-2 record.

"They don't have good size, but they're very well coached," Hickey said. "The big thing for us is to be really ready to play and not just walk out on to the court. If we get out there to play, I think we'll do real fine."

Carr overshoots NBA worth

Antoine Carr made Wichita State University basketball what it is today and now he's paying for it.

Before Carr arrived on the scene at WSU in 1979, the Shocker program was solid but unspectacular. The Shockers gained an occasional NCAA post-season bid, but for the most part dreamed of the days in the early '60s when WSU challenged the big boys behind the play of All-American Dave Stallworth.

But then came the news that Carr would stay in Wichita for his collegiate career. The 6-foot-9 forward was coming to WSU after leading Wichita Heights to state basketball supremacy.

The first major accomplishment Carr pulled off at WSU happened off the court. Carr talked another blue-chip player, Cliff Levingston, to leave the warmth of San Diego and join a team in the middle of Kansas — one of his more incredible feats. Together the "Bookend Forwards" terrorized the Missouri Valley Conference for three years as one of the most formidable front court tandems in college ball.

However, it was after Levingston left WSU his junior season to join the Detroit Pistons that Carr's career really began to shine.

Carr's senior season first looked to be an off year for the Shocker program. WSU had just lost Levingston and another player, 7-1 center Greg Dreiling, who decided the grass was greener on Snob Hill (KU). To top it all off, before the start of that year, Carr suffered a leg injury and missed much of the first half of the season.

TIM FILBY
Guest Columnist

The Shockers played surprisingly well in Carr's absence, causing some doubters to think WSU could do it without "Dr. Dunkenstein." But when Carr rejoined the team it became clear he was just what the Shockers needed to join the elite class of collegiate teams, although the team was shrouded behind the screen of an NCAA probation.

Behind Carr, the Shockers went 23-5 and left KU and K-State sinking in the mediocrity of losing seasons. To top off his career, Carr scored a school record 47 points in his final game at WSU's Henry Levitt Arena.

The whole city then looked forward to the National Basketball Association draft to see where their local hero would set up shop. For a while it looked as if Carr would join All-University player Ralph Sampson in Houston as the NBA's second overall pick. But instead the Rockets passed up Carr in favor of Rodney McCray, causing Shocker fans to have an irrational loathing of the former Louisville star.

In the end, Carr was the first-round pick of the Detroit Pistons, the eighth player picked. Wichita fans were excited with the picture of Carr and Levingston joining up forces again in the Motor City. Carr would rake in a typical mega-buck NBA contract and then it was off to the hall of fame. But in Carr the Pistons weren't dealing with a typical ego. This was a man who was the prized citizen of Wichita, Kan. After the adulation Carr experienced in Wichita, it must have seemed inconceivable to have to negotiate with the Pistons. From what he heard at home, having sole ownership of General Motors was the only fitting salary. But instead the Detroit management only offered a paltry $1 million over four seasons.

The negotiations dragged on over the summer and into the fall. It became clear that Carr would probably miss the start of the NBA season and maybe the entire year. Carr, represented by a Wichita lawyer, and the Pistons involved themselves in a negotiation process that had little chance of success. Talks broke off and Carr was out of luck.

Finally it was announced this week that Carr has signed a contract. Success, right? Not so fast, the contract was with a team in Italy. Sure, it was a $275,000 contract, but it just wasn't the same as signing with an NBA club.

No, Carr's NBA future is not harmed irreparably, but the clear path to stardom that once stood in front of him has been blocked by a few boulders. Antoine Carr led WSU to the top of college basketball, but through an ego intoxicated by the adoration of an admiring hometown, Carr is paying for his deed by clouding up a once bright future.

Hopefully, Carr will realize that the whole world doesn't adore him like Shocker fans do and he will take stock of what his true worth, good but not great, is to an NBA club.

Chargers, Chiefs share AFC cellar

By The Associated Press

SAN DIEGO — After 14 weeks, the team's record is a lackluster 5-9, its season having been shattered by injuries, its running game has lacked punch and its only hope for success is a pass-happy offense.

When Don Coryell is talking about such things, it is natural to assume he's discussing his San Diego Chargers. But in this case, the subject was Kansas City, the Chargers' National Football League opponent Sunday at San Diego-Jack Murphy Stadium.

"They got off to a bad start (three straight losses after an opening victory), but since then they've become a real fine passing team," Coryell said. "In fact, they've thrown the ball more than we have."

Indeed, while the Chargers have thrown 550 passes, the Chiefs have fired a league-high 566, including 538 by Bill Kenney. Kenney holds club records for attempts, completions (304) and yardage (3,776) in a single season.

"They've had five real close games, and if things had gone a little different, they might be 10-4 and one of the top teams in the league," Coryell said.

The Chargers' season fell apart when their inspirational leader, quarterback Dan Fouts, suffered a shoulder injury Oct. 16. San Diego has won only two games since then and comes into this match of American Football Conference Western Division cellar-dwellers off a 42-10 pounding by the Los Angeles Raiders.

Kansas City, meanwhile, will be attempting to rebound from a 14-9 setback against Buffalo, the Chiefs' fifth loss in six games.

The Chargers' 5-9 mark is a marked drop from recent years of winning records, division titles and thoughts of the Super Bowl.

Kansas City, on the other hand, hasn't made the playoffs in 12 years, but all hope isn't lost, said the Chiefs' first-year coach, John Mackovic.

"Most success stories have poor beginnings," he said. "All have demanding setbacks or obstacles, and if you don't overcome the obstacles, you'll never become the success."

With playoff possibilities gone for both teams, there remain some individual goals worthy of note.

For the Chargers, Fouts needs 171 yards to become the ninth quarterback in NFL history to throw for 30,000 yards, and 310 yards to reach 3,000 yards in a season for the fourth time.

San Diego wide receiver Charlie Joiner is 77 yards away from becoming the fourth player to gain 10,000 yards on pass receptions.

Kenney's favorite target, Carlos Carson, leads NFL wide receivers with a club-record 69 catches and his 1,118 yards are 179 short of Otis Taylor's team mark.

Nebraska lineman nabs award

By The Associated Press

HOUSTON — Dean Steinkuhler, a massive offensive guard for the top-rated Nebraska Cornhuskers, was honored as college football's best lineman Thursday night as he received the 14th annual Lombardi Award.

Steinkuhler, who helped clear the way for teammate Mike Rozier, the winner of the 1983 Heisman Trophy, was selected for the award over Doug Dawson of Texas, Bill Fralic of Pittsburgh and Reggie White of Tennessee.

"Any time you have a guy like Mike (Rozier) behind you it can't help but make the line look better," Steinkuhler said after receiving the award. "I want to thank Mike, without him I probably wouldn't be here."

Former Los Angeles Rams player Merlin Olsen, the featured speaker at the awards banquet, asked Steinkuhler if he had given any thought to a career with the National Football League.

"If a guy walked in and offered me a million dollars to play in the NFL I wouldn't be in this room very long," Steinkuhler said.

The four finalists were chose by a panel of 158 college football coaches, sports writers and sportscasters to receive the 40-pound block of granite that is given as the trophy.

Proceeds from the awards dinner, given in honor of former Green Bay Coach Vince Lombardi, will go to the American Cancer Society. Lombardi died of cancer in 1970.

Steinkuhler, a 6-foot-3, 275-pound guard for the Cornhuskers, is the team's fastest lineman ever, running 40 yards in 4.67 seconds. A native of tiny Burr, Neb., where he played only eight-man football for Sterling High School, Steinkuhler was selected to The Associated Press's All Big Eight team and was second team All-American.

Judge dismisses suit against Carlin

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — A federal judge Thursday dismissed a multimillion-dollar lawsuit filed against Gov. John Carlin, Attorney General Robert Stephan and others by controversial broadcaster Nellie Babbs.

Mrs. Babbs, co-owner of KTTL-FM in Dodge City, filed the suit last week in U.S. District Court in Wichita. The suit asked the immediate recovery of her "rights, liberty and property" and alleged that she was denied due process of law by the defendants.

The lawsuit was dismissed by U.S. District Judge Patrick Kelly, who called it "wholly inappropriate and inadequate."

The suit sought at least $100 million in damages on each count but did not enumerate the counts. Mrs. Babbs said Tuesday that the $100 million figure was a typographical error and that the total amount of damages sought was about $40 million.

KTTL's operating license has been challenged before the Federal Communications Commission because of the station's programming against blacks and Jews and in favor of the right-wing Posse Comitatus, an anti-tax group.

Mrs. Babbs has said the broadcasts were protected by First Amendment guarantees of freedom of speech and freedom of the press.

Her husband, Charles Babbs, last month was given temporary control of KTTL after he filed suit to dissolve the partnership with his estranged wife. He said he had left his wife of 17 years in September because of disagreements over programming.

Mrs. Babbs said Carlin was named in the suit because he wasn't protecting her from harassment and hadn't attempted to replace the federal money system with a valid method of exchange.

Mrs. Babbs said she believes the money system is illegal and that paper money is worthless because it no longer is backed by gold or silver reserves.

Stephan was named in the suit because he is trying to force her to identify customers of her mobile phone service so he can harass them, Mrs. Babbs said.

Stephan has filed suit on behalf of the state Department of Revenue to force Mrs. Babbs to file a rendition statement listing the service's property for tax purposes.

Two Dodge City lawyers and a Kiowa County official also were listed as defendants in the suit.

Walesa's wife, son to accept Nobel Prize

By The Associated Press

WARSAW, Poland — Lech Walesa drove here from Gdansk Thursday with his wife and eldest son, who are bound for Norway to pick up his Nobel Peace Prize. He said "a whole division of police followed us."

The Solidarity founder said "five or six police cars" were posted at major intersections along the route from Gdansk. Several carloads of Western journalists who tried to follow him were stopped, but released after their papers were checked.

In other developments, the government said it would further delay parliamentary elections first scheduled for February 1982, and underground leaders of the outlawed union called for a demonstration in Warsaw Dec. 16.

Walesa, 40, his wife Danuta and their 13-year-old son Bogdan made the 204-mile trip to Warsaw from their home in the Baltic port city.

Mrs. Walesa, 34, and Bogdan will fly to Oslo today. Walesa will go back to Gdansk today and celebrate a Mass for all Polish Nobel laureates Saturday evening.

The Peace Prize will be awarded Saturday in Oslo. Walesa has said he fears the communist regime might not let him back into Poland if he went to Oslo, and he doesn't want to leave while 217 political prisoners remain in jail.

The underground Warsaw chapter of Solidarity called on union supporters to march peacefully along the main street, Marszalkowska, on Dec. 16 in memory of workers slain in clashes with security forces two years ago and in 1971. Solidarity's fugitive four-man "temporary coordinating commission" has called for demonstrations throughout Poland on the anniversary.

School loan consolidation program may lack congressional approval

By College Press Service

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The program that allowed students to consolidate all their school loans and stretch out the payment times for them "has gone the way of blue suede shoes" for the moment, aid officials in Washington reported.

The Senate recessed in November without passing a bill to continue the program through the next three years, and political considerations probably will stop the Senate from passing it when it reconvenes in January, said Dennis Martin of the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators.

Students who already have lumped their school loans together under the Student Loan Marketing Association (usually called Sallie Mae) program won't be affected by the end of the program.

But Martin said no more students will be able to consolidate their loans with Sallie Mae until Congress comes up with some kind of replacement in the future.

The bill that failed wasn't as generous to students as previous loan consolidation programs have been.

Under the new bill, students would have had to pay 9 or 10 percent interest on their loans, compared to the 7 percent they now pay. Moreover, they would have had 15 years to pay back the loans instead of the 20-year period they now have.

In addition, the new bill would have prohibited state loan agencies from making consolidation loans to students.

Bill sponsor Rep. Paul Simon, D-Ill., excluded the state loan agencies to try to increase the federal government's tax revenues.

Under the old system, states got money to lend to students by selling tax-exempt bonds to their citizens. The U.S. Treasury consequently couldn't collect taxes on the money used to buy the bonds.

But excluding state agencies was the major reason the Sallie Mae bill staggered in the Senate after being passed by the House.

"There are some real differences of opinion (in the Senate) over allowing state agencies to participate (in making consolidation loans)," Martin said. "It probably won't pass this time."

In that event, "the people already in the program will continue in it, but the program won't be available for any new people" after it expired in November, he said.

But Martin is "hopeful the program will be passed as part of the new Higher Education Reauthorization Act," which may not come to a vote until late 1984 or early 1985.

Instructor offers tax-saving ideas

By The Collegian Staff

As the end of the year approaches, so does the deadline for implementing tax-saving moves. Elias Saig, a K-State employee with a degree in economics, has taught several University for Man community tax classes. Saig offers some year-end tax saving ideas:

— Consider making your 1984 charitable contribution at the end of December 1983 to get a bigger deduction this year.

— If you intend to buy several expensive items soon, such as furniture and appliances, make the purchases before Dec. 31 and save your sales tax receipts. You can also increase your 1983 sales tax deduction by moving up the purchase of a car from January to December.

— Prepay your estimated 1983 state income tax before Dec. 31 and get another deduction this year.

— You may be able to prepay the property tax on your residence for an additional deduction.

Jury indicts 'dead' faker on fraud charge

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A man who faked his own death so his family could collect $250,000 in life insurance has been indicted on a charge of insurance fraud.

Carroll W. Baumgarner, 46, formerly of suburban Blue Springs, was indicted Wednesday by a federal grand jury in Kansas City. The indictment said other unnamed conspirators took part in the alleged scheme.

Baumgarner was arrested in Maryland last week by FBI agents, more than two years after he supposedly died in a boating accident in the Georgian Bay region of Ontario, Canada. He was charged with mail fraud last Friday in federal court in Kansas City.

The arrest ended a three-month investigation by the FBI and the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, said Robert B. Davenport, special agent in charge of the Kansas City FBI. The manhunt was prompted by an anonymous caller who told an FBI agent that Baumgarner was alive.

An FBI affidavit said Baumgarner disappeared Oct. 9, 1981, during a Canadian fishing trip with his brother 20 months after purchasing the life insurance. A report filed with the Ontario Provincial Police said Baumgarner drowned when his boat struck a shoal and he was thrown into the water.

The government said Baumgarner's wife filed a claim with the Farmers New World Life Insurance Co. of Washington and was paid $250,000 last December.

The insurance company filed suit Monday in Jackson County Circuit Court demanding the return of the insurance settlement. The suit also seeks $500,000 in punitive damages.
